Introductory Note

IN the following pages Dr. De Forest has accomplished a work as delicate as it is important. To deal with a great subject in a simple way is a mark of power, especially when that subject is removed from the sphere of American experience "as far as the East is from the West." It may be said that much interest in Japan is felt throughout Christian circles in America. But that interest lacks depth and definition. Beyond the notion that a spirit of progress prevails in modern Japan and that that progress consists in the assimilation of Western customs and ideas, there is much vagueness and no little misapprehension. And these occur from no lack of good and illuminating books, dealing with Japan from various points of view. There are such books and they are read with appreciation. Yet one whose privilege has been to come near to the soul of Japan, through intercourse with its leaders, realizes how difficult it is to make those aspirations fully understood by Western minds.

Some have written sympathetically of

Introductory Note

Japan, yet without knowledge; and some, writing with much knowledge, have lacked sympathy. In either case, the subject has been presented with misleading limitations. The readers of this book will find in it first-hand knowledge of facts, tempered with sympathetic appreciation of their meanings and relations. The training of the author has been felicitous. For many years he has lived in a part of the Empire relatively far from direct Western influences; and so, emerging more slowly and with more normal self-expression from the old feudalism into the new régime of a constitutional monarchy.

Sendai, Dr. De Forest's home, is far removed from the cosmopolitanism of Yokohama and Tokyo. Yet it is a thought centre of immense importance to the civil and military life of the nation. It is a place where the traditions of ancient glory mix with the new thought of the awakened Empire, and where the bearing of the past on the present can be studied apart from the confusing intervention of European detail. At Sendai, the seat of influence for Northern Japan, has the author resided throughout a large part of the new era of Meiji—or Enlightenment. He has lived, it is true, during this period, the life of a missionary. He has been loyal and outspoken in his allegiance to the Divine Saviour; fruitful in evangelistic labours. Yet, with this diligence as an ambassador for Christ, he has combined a respect for the ancestral religious experience of the Japanese people, and an appreciation of their finer feelings that has won the confidence and affection of those in high stations. During the later momentous years of the Meiji Era (Era of Enlightenment), Dr. De Forest has been persona grata in the inner circles of Japanese culture, and has enjoyed unusual opportunities to know the truth concerning the motives that govern and the ideas that attract the best representatives of Japanese society. He has been sought as a counsellor and cherished as a friend by officers of the government, directors of education, and makers of public opinion. He has seen very clearly that the larger mission of Christian teachers in Japan is to disseminate that vital essence of revelation which, because of its universal validity, takes up into itself whatever in any faith is of the truth, gathering together all things in one, even in Christ, the very God.

Dr. De Forest has realized the noble elements in Japanese thought and has not neglected to point them out with appreciation. It is strange that Christians ever should begrudge the acknowledgment of good in non-Christian faiths, when the presence of that good attests the universal working of the Holy Spirit. It is strange, too, that we are so ready to insist that the Christian life of an Eastern nation must, if it be genuine, move on the same lines of institutional and dogmatic development as those that have determined the religious history of Europe and America. Rather ought we to rejoice in the growth of an Eastern type of Christian theology and institutionalism, seeing therein the confirmation of St. Paul's large-minded view: "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. . . . All these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."

The simplicity of this book is one of its strong points. It will be understood without difficulty. But those who read it with discernment will read between the lines the wideness of the author's range of observation, the reality of his love for his subject, and his anxious longing that the forces now stirring Japanese society to its depths may, under the control and inspiration of the Divine Spirit, lead to the reconstruction of the national life upon the basis of evangelical faith.

THE COUNTRY

SINCE nearly every one knows that Japan is Size of Japan an Island Empire just east of China and Korea, there is no need of giving figures of latitude and longitude. If Japan were lying off the eastern coast of the United States, it would overlap the whole coast from above Maine to Cuba, and the capital, Tokyo, would be off Cape Hatteras. This chain of islands is over two thousand miles long, but as the land does not average one hundred miles in width, there are only about 161,545 square miles in all. Compared with European states, this makes a fair show, since the British Islands, with Belgium, Holland, and Denmark thrown in, would be no larger. The United States is nineteen times as large, and all Japan, including Formosa, but not Japanese Saghalien, only slightly exceeds the area of California.

Present-day Japan consists of four large islands, Hokkaido, Hondo, Shikoku, and Kyushu, with Formosa ceded to Japan in 1895 at the close of the war with China. The southern half of Saghalien became the northern territory of the Empire after the war with Russia. Nor must we forget that Japan has established a protectorate over Korea and likewise controls Manchuria from Port Arthur to Mukden. After Japan gained Formosa the United States annexed the Philippines; and thus these two nations, that were four thousand miles apart, suddenly became neighbors.

and Auxiliary Territory

Number of Islands

The number of islands in the Japanese Empire nobody knows. Some are so small that they disappear in the time of floods. But those whose circumference is one *ri*¹ or more number 548, with a coast-line of 18,113 miles.

Geological Formation

This chain of islands is virtually an immense mountain range raised up out of the Pacific Ocean about the same time, geologically, as the Rocky Mountains. If Japan were raised a thousand feet higher, it would cease to be an island, and would be joined to Asia, just as the Rockies are a part of America. When Japan began to appear, its whole length was almost north and south, and extended down to thirty degrees latitude. Even now a great submerged chain of mountains runs from the Tokyo region south, and the peaks appear on the maps as groups of little islands. Some mighty convulsion seems to have bent the lower half of Japan toward the west, and almost to have wrenched it from the northern half.

¹A ri has a length of about 2.44 miles.

The formation of these islands is not yet finished, for Japan is still slowly rising from the Pacific with a movement so gentle that the strata in large sections remain perfectly level. The wide and fruitful plain around Tokyo, only a few hundred years ago, was a vast inlet of the ocean. The place where the second city of the Empire, Osaka, now stands, was a part of the beautiful Inland Sea some 400 years ago. There are bluffs in the northern part of Japan 200 feet high, to the tops of which the fishermen used to fasten their boats.

Gradual Elevation of the Land

Because earthquakes and volcanoes have played such a prominent part in the making of this Empire, it is a land of wondrous beauty. These fearful agents have not yet completed their work. Travellers from San Francisco are greeted with the smoke of a living volcano, as they approach Yokohama Bay, and they who ride on the cars may occasionally see a grand column of smoke rising thousands of feet from the crater of some near volcano. How beautiful is the slope of the peerless Fujiyama rising 12,365 feet from the level of the ocean! There are other magnificent volcanic mountains in the world, but none that rise so high, with one unbroken curve, as Fuji. Everywhere mountains, little and large, are in sight. They are partly covered with bamboo groves and woods, amid which are innumerable cascades and waterfalls, while the valleys below are of every conceivable shape, all continually delighting the eye with ever-varying beauty. It is this exceptional scenery that attracts many tourists from foreign lands. And it is this perpetual beauty that has made the people all lovers of the beautiful, which is reflected in their houses, their clothes, their gardens, and their household utensils.

Loss of Life Involved

Volcanic forces are fearfully deadly at times. Some years ago, more than a thousand feet of Mt. Bandai blew off in an hour and killed 460 people living in adjacent villages. The erupted matter made a wide dam across the mountain valley, and thus created a lakelet of rare beauty 4,000 feet above sea level. But a few years ago, a little island, Torishima, one of the peaks of that submerged range south of Tokyo, exploded, killing all on the island. Pages could be filled with accounts of the terrible devastations wrought by these volcanoes.

Hot Springs Beneficial

But, nevertheless, these destructive forces have been most beneficial to the millions of Japan. This may sound strange, but there would certainly have been no such beautiful Japan but for what these giant forces have done, and without them there would be none of the health-giving hot springs with which the land is studded. There are over 1,000 of these springs, most of them mineral, and nearly all of them abounding in curative properties. Just imagine 1,000 hot springs scattered over New England, New York and Pennsylvania! What a difference it would make in the customs of the people! This is the secret of the cleanliness of the Japanese. Nature has furnished free hot baths which are numbered among the cherished treasures of the Empire.

So there is comparatively little level ground in these islands. About one sixth is under cultivation, and a few tens of thousands of acres are being added yearly to the cultivated region. The larger part of this arable portion is near the coast and less than 100 feet above the sea level, so that a huge tidal wave might easily sweep out of existence all the great cities, and indeed half the population of the Empire. Even the little tidal wave of 1894, so small that it was unnoticed by fishermen a mile or two from shore, acquired such force as it entered the narrow bays along the north-eastern coast, that it rose to a height of eighty feet in some places, and destroyed 30,000 people. While Japan was still a hermit nation, a huge tidal wave swept the southern coast and carried off over 100,000 persons.

Until Japan annexed Formosa, the highest mountain was Fujiyama. But Formosa carries on its back Mt. Shintaka, 14,000 feet in

Destruction by Tidal Waves

16 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

The "Peerless Mountain"

height, thus relegating Fuji to the second place. But Shintaka can never usurp the affections of the people, for Fuji has always been the ideal of beauty, and also a source of profound religious thought. Even should Japan annex all the highest mountains of the world, Fuji would still be the people's Peerless Mountain. It is on their lacquer trays, on silks, in paintings and carvings. To many, it is a sacred place, and thousands of pilgrims make the difficult ascent every summer. The words of the Shinto priest, Mr. Shibata, at the Chicago Parliament of Religions, show how the mountain is regarded: "We ought to reverence the famous Fuji, assuming it to be the sacred abode of the divine Lord, and as the brain of the whole globe. Every child of the Heavenly Deity ought to make Fuji the example and emblem of his thought and action. For instance, he must be plain and simple as the form of the mountain, and make his body and mind pure as the mountain is serene."

The Longest Rivers

Japan being a narrow range of mountain-covered islands, there can be no large navigable rivers unless they run in the general direction of the backbone, and, naturally, they will be few. Just as people are surprised to learn that the highest mountain of Japan is far south in Formosa, so it excites not a little wonder to be told that the longest river is far north in Hokkaido. This river, Ishikari, is 412 miles long, and the next is the Shinano which empties into the Japan Sea at Niigata, after running 190 miles. Then comes the Kitakami River, remarkable not so much for its length of 175 miles as for its history. The long valley in northern Japan through which this river flows used to be a wide strait, and the land east was an island of about the same shape as Formosa, and perhaps two thirds as large. As the land became elevated, the strait contracted into a river, which left from time to time broad and high terraces all along the valley. Some books on Japan do not even mention these two great rivers, Ishikari, and Kitakami, but give as the longest the Tone, and Shinano, which indeed lie in the most thickly populated part of Japan, and are far better known than the others. Even these largest rivers are navigable only by small steamers, and then only for a short portion of their length. Broad-bottomed freight boats, however, do a prosperous business on all the rivers, small or large. Where the currents are too strong for sailing, the boatmen draw their vessels up stream with ropes or pole them up the rapids.

PEERLESS FUJI

Difficult to Navigate

It costs large amounts of money to keep these rivers where they belong, and to make them useful to the nation. The total sum expended in a year goes as high as 15,000,000 yen (about $7,500,000) and the government is now contemplating the expenditure of 30,000,-000 yen (about $15,000,000) on the five largest rivers of central Japan. So there was some reason for one of Japan's ancient rulers saying that the two things impossible to govern are the priests, and the rivers. It is so difficult to maintain bridges over these ungovernable rivers that the crossings are often by ferries or pontoons, and, of course, every flood temporarily stops all travel. These waterways entail not only large expenditures but are also the occasion of great anxiety to the people who live along their banks. All the rivers are dangerous in times of prolonged rain, and occasionally they break their banks to the utter ruin of the farms within their sweep. Sometimes villages are inundated and even swept away with their people, just as a tidal wave brings destruction along the coast.

18 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

One very curious thing about the shorter rivers that come tearing down the mountain-sides near the sea is that they bring down so much sand that their beds are gradually raised. To prevent damaging overflows, the people gradually build up the river-banks, so that now some of the rivers are so much higher than the surrounding land that the railroad runs under them without changing level.

Embankment Problem

Costly Overflows

There are two such crossings between Kobe and Osaka.

The climate is very much like the little girl Weather who,

“When she was good, she was very, very good,
And when she was bad, she was horrid.”

There are cloudless spring days, when the whole land blossoms out in beautiful colours, and harvest days when glorious autumn tints cover the hills, but there are also periods of cloudy and rainy weather continuing for weeks, and even months.

In the summer, the prevailing winds are from the south and are warm and debilitating. The heat in central and southern Japan, all over the lowlands, is intense, and foreigners especially have to be careful not to expose themselves to the sun. The nights are so oppressive that it is difficult to sleep, and in the day-time, when the sun does not shine, the air is so moist that the least exertion throws one into profuse perspiration. Added to this, the rainy season is spread over the warmest months, and once in a while, as in northern Japan in 1902, there is hardly a pleasant day all summer. Because there is so much damp weather in summer, everything that is capable of moulding suffers—books, walls, clothing, bedding, and stuffed furniture are all subject to the malign influence of this musty disease.

In Summer

In Mountains But as soon as one gets away from the cities of the plains into the mountains, above 2,000 feet, the air becomes deliciously cool and invigorating. Middays will still be hot, and climbing the mountains will induce speedy perspiration; but the cool nights bring refreshing sleep. Among the well-known summer resorts are Nikko, Karuizawa, Hakone, Arima, and Hieizan, at which places missionaries especially gather for conferences, study, and needed rest. So famous have these places become that many missionaries in China who have need of brief rest come to these health-giving resorts of Japan.

In Winter The winter weather is largely controlled by the winds from the north, which also are laden with moisture and disagreeably cold. The frost is not keen nor enough to render skating possible, save in north Japan or in the mountains. The western side of the islands is much colder in winter than the side along the Pacific, which is tempered by the Black Stream very much as the Gulf Stream is said to modify the climate of the Atlantic States. Sometimes the snows completely bury whole villages, so that the people actually burrow under the snow.

Variety of Climate So there is every variety of climate in this land which reaches as far north as Nova Scotia, and whose south is as near the equator as Cuba, and whose mountain ranges have tops from which snow never disappears. The number of pleasant days is nearly double that of rainy days, so that, in spite of objectionable features, Japan is a delightful country to live in.

The population of Japan proper in 1872 was 33,110,825. Its rapid increase is seen from the census of 1908, which gives 49,319,166. The average annual increase is over 650,000, which shows that the people are a vigorous and healthy race. They are packed very thickly in these islands. Just imagine 49,319,000 people in California, where there are now only 1,723,000! Or, if the Atlantic States were as densely populated as Japan proper, they would contain 150,000,000 instead of 36,000,000. There are about 334 people to the square mile, and this proportion is not very different from that of Massachusetts and Connecticut taken together. This rapid increase necessitates places for the overflow population, and the nearest places of colonization are within the Empire itself, being Hokkaido and Formosa.

Hokkaido is about one fifth as large as the whole of Japan, yet it has a very sparse population, consisting of only 1,000,000 people. Some 50,000 people annually go north to settle in this newly-opened island, which is capable of supporting a population of 5,000,000. Americans have had a large share in opening up this land and in revealing its mineral and agricultural resources. It is that section of Japan most like the United States, in its prairies and elms, its methods of farming, and its style of building houses with chimneys. On the map, Hokkaido looks as if it had a great dragon head with wide-opened jaws coming down to swallow the island below it. And in that mouth lies a beautiful and capacious harbour with Hakodate on its shore.

People in Formosa

Formosa is scarcely one half as large as Hokkaido, yet it has over three times as many people, the large majority being Chinese. But when the mountainous parts also are opened and rendered safe from the savage "head-hunters," there will be room for several millions more; for Kyushu, which is only one eighth larger than Formosa, has a population of 7,278,000.

Emigration to Other Lands

But tens of thousands are going outside of their islands in search of work and education. Sixty thousand are in Hawaii, and some 70,000 are in the United States and Canada. The great rush, however, is now for Korea and Manchuria, where already about 150,000 merchants, farmers, ex-soldiers, and adventurers are rapidly settling.

Westerners in Japan

It must not be forgotten that the foreigners residing in Japan have been a mighty influence, mainly for good, in the regeneration of the nation. By foreigners, we do not mean Chinese nor Koreans, but Westerners. It is astonishing to learn that they are so few in number, only 6,170, including women and children. One can easily infer which nations have had the most influence here, from the fact that about two thirds of these foreigners are Anglo-Saxons. One can also readily estimate the amount of direct Christian influence, since, of these few thousands, 791 are Protestant missionaries, 243 are Catholic, and two are Russian. Japan is probably the best manned of all the great mission fields, averaging one Protestant missionary to 62,476 people.

There is no more wonderful political transformation in the history of the whole world than the rapid and successful passage of Japan from a country wholly closed against foreigners to one open to free international intercourse, and from absolute monarchy to a constitutional government. It is only a little over fifty years (July 7th, 1853) since Commodore Perry's fleet entered Yokohama Bay and startled Japan out of her two hundred and fifty years of sleep. "It took only those few black ships to scare us almost to death," said a prominent Japanese afterward.

At any rate, Japan awoke, hating for a time, those who had thus rudely aroused her, but fully determined to learn all that her supposed enemies could teach her. "You are stronger than we are now. We will learn all you can teach, and then—we will fight you," was the frank statement of many Japanese in the early Meiji Era. Later on, one of these Samurai, when asked what he had regarded as the greatest change that had taken place in Japan, replied: "I'm ashamed to tell you. We hated and despised you foreigners, but now we regard you as our teachers in everything."

Motive for Progress

24 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

Effect of Foreign Travel

Even before a temporary treaty could provide two or three open ports for communication with the outer world, eager young men longed to get out of the country and see the world with their own eyes, and to use their new knowledge for Japan. "The frog in the well knows not the great ocean," is one of the many suggestive national proverbs. The first to leave Japan was Neesima Jo, and he took this brave step when the penalty for leaving the country was death. Other young men followed, and then embassies of distinguished Japanese were sent abroad. Their eyes were opened to the power and value of the civilization of the West, so that when they returned, they, with kindred spirits, undertook the stupendous work of bringing Japan out of isolation, and feudalism, and caste, into international intercourse, constitutional government, universal education, and equality before the law. The policy of the reform party created a profound commotion throughout the land and a brief, but effective, war, between the Shogun's forces and the Imperial troops speedily ended in favour of the young Emperor's army. The royal abode was changed from Kyoto to Tokyo, and the Meiji Era (Era of Enlightenment) was ushered in by an epoch-creating proclamation, in which it was declared that "State affairs shall be decided by a deliberative assembly," and "Knowledge shall be sought for throughout the whole world." The edict closed with the assurance "This is to be the greatest reformation ever witnessed in this land."

Under the young Emperor, Mutsuhito, was thus begun the task of reorganizing the administrative and judicial affairs of a great nation. The first step was the creation of a Cabinet, much like those of Western nations, which has nine Departments, presided over by the Prime Minister. The Departments are those of the Army, Navy, Finance, Foreign Affairs, Justice, Home Affairs, Education, Agriculture, and Commerce and Communications. The Constitution was promulgated February 11, 1889. It provides for the establishment of the Imperial Diet, which is composed of the House of Peers with about 364 members, and the House of Representatives with 380 members. The latter is elected entirely by the people for a term of four years, while the former contains members of the nobility together with forty-six commoners who pay the largest taxes. Besides these, are a few, who, "for meritorious services rendered to the State, or for erudition," are, from time to time, appointed as life members of the House of Peers by the Emperor—hence, the number of Peers is not fixed, as is the representation of the House of Representatives.

Two Immense Reforms

Trial by Torture Abolished

But of far more interest to the average reader are two immense reforms, without which Japan would still be a semi-barbarous nation.

The first was the abolition of torture. It seems strange that there could have been any hesitation about abolishing the cruel and unjust custom of trial by torture. When once the eager, open-minded leaders of Japan had seen the criminal courts of Western nations conducted without recourse to torture, it might have been thought that they would have hastened to adopt this reform. But it took a decade of bitter discussion between conservatives and progressives before the victory was won for open courts and trial by evidence. Indeed, we may say that it would have taken very many years longer, but for the intense desire of the Japanese to have the foreigners residing in Japan subject to the laws of Japan. And when at last the civil and criminal codes were completed, one great obstacle to making equal treaties with Japan was removed. Under the new laws it was now safe for Western powers to entrust their people residing in Japan to the jurisdiction of Japan, just as Japanese in the United States are subject to its laws. Thus Japan is the first of the great Eastern nations to be recognized as the political equal of Western nations, and great was the joy of all the people at this consummation of their desires.

The second of these great reforms was the granting of religious liberty. Before the Meiji Era, it was death for any Japanese to have anything to do with Christianity. What a change came when the Twenty-eighth Article of the Constitution was adopted:

"Japanese subjects shall, within limits not prejudicial to peace and order, and not antagonistic to their duties as subjects, enjoy freedom of religious belief."

This is the article that has given Japan a unique place in the history of missions from the days of the apostles until now. For there never before was a non-Christian nation in which Christianity had the full protection of the government, with liberty to its professors to go anywhere and everywhere throughout the land. Just imagine what a difference it will make with Turkey, if recent reforms shall be permanently established. What happiness will be given multitudes in Russia if the Czar shall give his millions the same religious liberty that the Emperor of Japan has conferred on his subjects! It is to the lasting honour of Japan that her minister in Washington, Mr. Takahira, could

Religious Liberty Proclaimed

Open Door for Christianity

publish in the Independent, July 4th, 1901, this statement: "The profession and the propagation of Christianity are as untrammelled in Japan as in any part of the world."

Growth of Railroads

We have now seen the greatest of the judicial and administrative reforms. Among the material improvements, the railroads and telegraph service are conspicuous. In 1874, two little railroads of twenty miles each were opened. Now a glance at the map shows that the whole Empire is connected by a main line to which many side lines are feeders. The total mileage, 4,808 (1907), to be sure, is very small compared with that of the United States, and is about one fifth that of Great Britain. Twenty years ago, it took seven days to go by jinrikisha from Tokyo to Kyoto, now it takes only fifteen hours by train.

Telegraphs

Twenty sen (10 cents) sends a telegram anywhere, save to the very sparsely populated interior, and letters are delivered for two sen even in the hills. In cities and towns, mails are delivered and collected several times a day.

Steamships

The progress made in transportation by steamers is remarkable. The first of the foreign "inventions" that the Shogun and Daimyos eagerly desired to buy were steamers. Their junks looked insignificant by the side of these swift ocean vessels, which at once became a necessity to the progress and the safety of the Empire. Small coasting steamers began to multiply and then there gradually developed the commercial fleets that now invade the West in competition with mercantile marine of the whole world. One company, the Nippon Yusen Kwaisha, has 116 steamers with an aggregate tonnage of 254,461 tons. Many of these ships were bought in Europe, but the new ones are now built at home.

So long as Japan hated foreign intercourse there was no need of lighthouses along her dangerous coast. But as soon as she opened her harbours, there was pressing need of permanent beacon lights for her own sake and for the sake of the shipping of other nations. The many lighthouses all along her coast now are a symbol of new Japan, no longer in isolation and twilight, but friendly to all nations.

Not only for the sake of peaceful commerce were steamers a necessity, but to protect the national commerce and for self-defence an army and navy were indispensable. It is difficult to imagine the discouragements the Japanese had to overcome in developing their army of over half a million soldiers and building up their wonderful navy. But it has been done in such an effectual manner that they gained a speedy victory over China in 1895, rendered invaluable aid to the allied troops in the march to Peking in 1900, and won every battle against Russia in and Inter-

lations

1904-5 on land and sea, driving back her army out of Korea and southern Manchuria, and destroying or capturing about all of Russia's navy. The whole world was startled at this unparalleled series of victories that made Japan one of the half dozen great powers of the world. Japan, however, does not love war, and in order to preserve peace in the East her alliance with England has been renewed. In order also that Western peoples may understand her better she has invited all nations to a Grand Exhibition in 1912 in Tokyo.

Growth of Wealth and Manufactures

The whole wealth of Japan is roughly estimated at 15,000,000,000 yen, one yen being equal to fifty cents in United States coin. The total exports and imports for 1907 were 926,-880,000 yen, or nearly two and one half times as much as ten years ago. Twenty-five years ago there was hardly a manufacturing chimney in Osaka, the wealthiest of all the cities of Japan, but now it is fairly girdled with a belt of factories whose tall chimneys tower conspicuously above the low dwellings of the people. The Emperor Nintoku, 2,200 years ago, as he viewed the slender jets of smoke rising from the huts of his people in Osaka, rejoiced that the people had rice to cook. If he could now view the huge clouds of smoke that the chimneys of thousands of factories send forth, he would rejoice that his people had at last discovered the resources necessary to high civilization. He would see 160,000,000 yen worth of silk going abroad to nations the names of which he had never heard, and tea, cotton, lacquer ware, rice, and works of art, being exported to the extent of 320,000,000 yen a year. But he would also find his land burdened with a huge debt of 2,276,000,000 yen, mainly due to the wars with China and Russia. And yet Japan is steadily growing in resources, and is changing from a purely agricultural to more of a manufacturing nation, whose very life now depends upon friendly intercourse with the other nations of the world.

HOW TO USE THE QUESTIONS AT THE END OF EACH CHAPTER

Do not fail to read these instructions through carefully before taking up the questions for study.

It is not supposed that the average member or the average class will attempt to answer all these questions. The leader should select the quantity and quality that he judges to be suited to the ability of the class and assign them for study at least a week in advance of the recitation. In selecting questions, an attempt should be made to preserve some sort of connection between them.

These questions are nearly all thought questions,—that is, they demand some thinking on the part of the student. Complete answers will be found in the book for very few of them. They make more or less use of the material found in the book, but require some thought in addition. This sort of question is much better than those which call for nothing more than a repetition of the words of the book. The text-book is not so much a collection of gold bricks to be packed away in your mind, as a gymnasium, by exercise in which you are to develop the power to think clearly about missions in Japan.

There may be, however, some members who have no other idea of study and reciting than that of hunting out answers that are furnished fully by the text, and repeating these answers when the appropriate question is asked in the class. To such only a few of the simpler questions of those given below should be assigned, and the remainder of the recitation may be made up of questions such as those to which they are accustomed. These latter the average leader will have no difficulty in constructing for himself.

In using the list printed in the book, the student should make it his aim not to dispose of a question as rapidly as possible, but to dwell upon it until the issues involved in it become perfectly clear. Many of the questions are not such as can be answered at once by the average student. They have been chosen purposely not only so as to leave something to be cleared up by discussion in the session, but many of them with the idea that they may lead to a difference of opinion and hence promote a more spirited discussion. In taking up each one, let your first move be to ascertain all that the text-book has to say on the subject. This, in some cases may be more or less scattered through the chapter. Many questions that seem difficult at first sight will be found, when all the facts have been gathered, to involve only a very simple combination and inference. Your ability to answer other of the questions will depend upon your general knowledge, and the leader is at fault if he assigns you something that is entirely beyond you. If you are unable to answer any question that has been assigned, however, do not become discouraged, but mark it and bring it up in the class. If it cannot be answered satisfactorily even there, note it and think about it. Light may dawn upon you later. Try to come to the recitation with your mind made up as far as possible on the points assigned, that you may be able to enter freely into the debate and yet try to come with an open mind ready to receive from others.

Above all things, avoid mere guessing at answers. It is neither a disgrace nor a misfortune to be unable to answer some of these questions even after careful thought; it is both, to jump at conclusions and to hold them without sufficient reasons. Even when your reasons seem to you adequate, hold them subject to further correction. You will get more good from discussing questions intelligently without answering them, than from answering them without discussing them intelligently.

Leaders of classes should not fail to apply to their denominational secretaries for pamphlet helps containing not only suggestions for the conduct of each session, but general hints on the organization of classes and on teaching methods.

QUESTIONS FOR STUDY

Aim.—To get the necessary geographical background for an intelligent study of Japan, and to estimate the probable future of the Empire.

1. Use maps of Asia and of the United States and compare the latitudes of the entire Empire and also those of the four principal islands with those of the United States.
2. If Tokyo be placed a little north of Cape Hatteras, about where will Hakodate lie?
3. Let some one be appointed to calculate in United States distances how far Tokyo is from Kyoto, and also from Nagasaki.

4. What States are about equal in size to each of the five islands?
5. Study the map so as to be able to draw from memory a very rough outline, inserting Hakodate, Tokyo, Yokohama, Kyoto, Osaka, Kobe, and Nagasaki.
6. What belt of climate contains all the great world powers at the present time?
7. Is this fact a mere coincidence, or is there some reason for it?
8. What advantage is it to Japan that she extends from edge to edge of the North Temperate Zone?
9. What Asiatic harbor is nearest to the coast of North America?
10. What commercial significance has this fact?
11. What advantages does Japan derive from her position in competing with other nations for the trade of China?
12. What advantages of situation has Japan over the other world powers for offensive military operations in Eastern Asia?
13. What advantages of situation has she over China and Korea for defensive operations?
14. Sum all the advantages that Japan derives from her geographical situation as to climate, commerce, and military operations.
15. What have been the changes in Japan as to international intercourse since 1854?
16. What have been the changes in government?
17. Sum up the more striking changes as to civilization.
18. Compare the Japanese revolution of 1868 with the French Revolution in political importance.
19. What does the progress of Japan since 1868 indicate as to the future?
20. How did Japan compare with Russia in her politi-

- cal and educational ideals before the Russo-Japanese War?
21. What inferences will the people of Asia draw from the result of this war?
 22. Can you name any results from it that have already taken place in Asia?
 23. What is apt to be the future influence of Japan in the Orient?
 24. What is the bearing of all this on the importance of her evangelization? Make your answer as impressive as possible.

THE PEOPLE

NOBODY seems to know from whence the Japanese originally came. Until recently they themselves firmly believed that they were descendants of "the gods," and even to-day, in spite of all the new knowledge that mankind is of one blood, the six millions of children in the primary schools are taught in their readers thus: "The God Amaterasu is the ancestor of His Majesty the Emperor and is indeed a noble God. From Amaterasu to the present Emperor the imperial line has never been broken."

Traditional Origin

Progressive Japanese have accepted modern thought to such an extent that there are very few educated persons who believe the old mythology. They omit all the stories of the gods, and begin their country's history with the first Emperor, Jimmu, who is said to have ascended the throne 660 b. c., though his throne must have been a crude affair and his people but a few thousands of barbarians. As to their origin, the Japanese frankly say: "We don't know exactly where we came from, but undoubtedly some of our ancestors came from Northern Asia, others from Korea, and others from Malayan regions." They are, at any rate, a mixed race, as any one can see from their different facial types. Some are flat faced and heavily bearded; others are oval faced, with high brows, more prominent noses, and with scanty beards. A few are so like the people of the West that, when they are travelling abroad, they are never taken for Asiatics. "Nobody suspected that I was a Japanese," said one of these educated men on his return to Japan. Some have faces exactly like those of the American Indians and all the people have dark hair and eyes. When foreigners first began to come, the Japanese were amazed at the red hair and blue eyes of some of their visitors and at the tow-headed babies.

Uncertainty

Average Height and Weight

Though descended from Asian races, the Japanese are shorter than Chinese and Koreans. When Japanese sit on chairs by the side of foreigners, there is no marked difference in their height, which shows that their bodies are of normal length. But as soon as they stand, their low stature becomes conspicuous, showing that their shortness is in their legs. This defect may have arisen from sitting on the mats in kneeling fashion, and also from being carried through childhood on the backs of their mothers and nurses. Their average height is about that of European women and their weight is much below that of European men. "In Europe the average weight of young men of twenty is 144 pounds, while that of the Tokyo conscripts for the army was only 111 pounds."

They are a hardy race and can endure Vitality conditions that would rapidly exterminate Americans. In cold, windy weather, farmers will work bare-legged all day, men and women too, in the deep mud of the rice fields. Young men may be seen running bare-footed over snow, or wading rivers in winter for the sake of a half pound of fish.

In order to understand this great nation, little heed should be paid to their curious and even ridiculous customs, and attention should be given to the way in which society is organized, and family life carried on. He who knows these two things does not consider the Japanese an "awfully funny people," but knows the inner forces that have made Japan what it is.

The four classes of society were, until recently, the Samurai, farmers, artisans, and merchants. Outside of these were the despised Eta, who, being social outcasts, had none but degrading occupations. Besides these there are the hairy, drunken, filthy, ignorant, but amiable Ainu, who live in Hokkaido. As soon as Japan began to catch the spirit of Western civilization, these class distinctions were abolished, and three grades were established—the nobility, the gentry, and the common people.

Modern Democratic Spirit

The effects of this wide-sweeping change are very apparent. The real democratic spirit is seen in the complete removal of all barriers in the system of education, in the organization of the army and navy, and in local and national elections. More than half of the 6,000 students in the two Imperial Universities are from the common people, and the children of all classes, except the nobles, attend the same public schools. In a recent Diet there were 224 commoners, that is, three times as many as were elected from among the gentry.

Influence of Samurai

It would, however, be a great mistake to conclude that the influence of the Samurai (gentry) has departed. They played too important a part in the building up of Old Japan to be dismissed by a mere edict. They constituted about five per cent. of the population, and were the military retainers of the Daimyos, wearing their swords in the belief that the sword is the soul of the Samurai. They embodied the principle of loyalty, and made it one of the corner stones on which

JAPANESE CHRISTIAN FAMILY
(Pastor Miyaki)

New Japan so firmly stands. Their lives were not their own, but their lords'; and Dr. Neesima used to say: "When Japanese become loyal to Christ, they will both live for Him and also gladly die for Him."

Not only did the Samurai code demand self-sacrifice for superiors, but it required simplicity of life, disdain of money, and love of righteousness, though this righteousness was not like that of the Bible. Out of this relation of the lord and his retainers came some of the noblest stories of Old Japan, and that same spirit lives in the intense patriotism which permeates the nation. It should be remembered that the great Christian leaders have come from the Samurai, though others are coming forward from other classes with promise of great spiritual power.

Old Samurai
Spirit

Family life and customs in Japan are very different from those which prevail in America and Europe and in nothing is the difference more marked than in the marriage customs. The young man does not select his own wife, but some relative or friend of the family discovers a suitable girl, and after the formal negotiations between the parents, the young people are introduced. If they are satisfied with each other's record and looks, their parents make the engagement. The prospective bridegroom does no courting after the

Family Life

44 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

No Courtship Western style. In due time, the would-be bride is taken to the house of her future husband's father—it would never do for the young man to go and bring his bride—where the formal marriage ceremony is performed with a great feast, in which the new couple pledge each other in nine tiny cups of sake. They are now husband and wife so far as custom goes, but the marriage is not legalized until the bride's name has been transferred in the public registrar's office from her family to that of her husband.

No New Home Founded Since the young couples have to live with the parents instead of beginning a home for themselves, the bride has to become a servant to her mother-in-law, look out faithfully for the comfort of her father-in-law, and please her husband too. I know sons who have been forced to divorce wives because they did not suit the young men's parents. Sometimes it works the other way, and when a son wishes to get rid of his wife, the parents refuse to permit the change.

Perpetuation of Bride's Family In the case of an only daughter, a go-between searches out one who will make a fitting husband; and when the match is arranged between the two families, the bride does not go to her husband's home and take his name, but he goes to her home and takes her name. For neither Japanese custom nor the new laws permit an only daughter to leave her home and abandon her family name. She must remain at home in order that her future children may keep up that family line. The legal marriage is consummated when the young man's name is formally changed at the registrar's office. In this case it is the bridegroom who becomes a kind of servant to his new parents. Here too there is ample room for a family quarrel, which in far too many cases results in divorce.

Enough has been said to show that the Japanese family begins in a different manner from ours, and the cause of this lies in what is called the Family Line. Every Japanese desires to maintain his family line, and regards failure to do so a great misfortune and even disgrace. This is why parents who have only one child, cannot give it to another house, but must adopt a son or a daughter, and thus continue their line and name. When there are no children, the childless parents may adopt a boy and a girl and thus establish the family line anew. Japanese are surprised when they first learn that Westerners do not think much of a family line maintained by adoption. I have been asked in wonder: "Why did not your great and noble Washington adopt some young man of good family and so maintain his family line?" My questioner felt that our first President had failed in his moral obligations by neglecting this seemingly important step.

Family Line
All-important

Every foreigner who goes to Japan is impressed with the immense number of happy babies strapped on the backs of children only a little bigger than themselves, all playing in the streets, utterly regardless of the jinrikishas, bicycles, carts, and horses. Japan has been called "The Paradise of babies." They are petted and dressed and loved, and have as good a time as any children perhaps in any land, though what they have to endure would often prove fatal to foreign babies. Their food lacks in nourishment, their parents are ignorant of hygiene, and, when driven by poverty, are cruel. Even in their sports the children's heads often are so exposed that it would seem that their brains would be baked by the fierce rays of the sun.

In training children, the great aim is to teach obedience. This is the second essential virtue in the making of the Japanese people, the first one, as already stated, being loyalty. But Japanese obedience differs considerably from that called for in a Western home. You can see at once that it is something peculiar, because it is called "filial piety." That is, it has a religious element in it, and involves much more than Americans mean by obedi-

Significance of Obedience

ence. It includes not only reverent obedience in early years, but obedience for life, providing for parents in old age, and worshipping them when they have passed into the spirit land. This far-reaching obedience has played a wonderful part in building up this powerful nation. Out of this, too, come some of the noblest stories that have developed the moral power of the nation. But out of this have also come grave evils, for parents have too much authority. As we have seen, young people do not become independent on getting married, but are still under obedience to the old folks as long as they live. Until recently parents in poverty could kill their new-born babe, or sell a grown-up daughter into a life of shame. The new laws, however, have modified the authority of parents, so that a young man of thirty, or a girl of twenty-five, is at liberty to marry even against the will of parents. It is a significant break in the old family life that children are now recognized as having rights as well as duties.

As for woman, everybody knows that women are never regarded with honour in non-Christian lands. A few may compel respect by their exceptional ability, others may be petted for their beauty and amiability, but, as a class, they are looked upon as inferior to man. No woman, in the olden times, was allowed to ascend such sacred mountains as Fuji and Aso. When Commodore Perry was negotiating the first treaty, he was told that no foreign woman should ever step on the sacred soil of Japan. And Buddhism declared that no woman could ever gain paradise unless she were good enough to be reborn as a man. In spite of all this the women of Japan are much better off than those of any other Eastern nation, and their position has been greatly improved since the beginning of intercourse with the West. That woman as well as man has rights and is worthy of respect, are doctrines that are being gladly welcomed and put into practice. The great educator, Fukuzawa, whose writings have done more for woman than those of any other Japanese author, performed a splendid work by his earnest advocacy of a pure home, and by his denunciations of the wrong and cruel treatment of women. Women's clubs, whose aim is to promote culture, to reform family life, and to encourage philanthropic works, have sprung up all over the land. Japan is exceedingly fortunate at this time in having so noble a woman as the present Empress, whose life is full of sympathy with every form of woman's progress, and whose heart is warm toward every benevolent work.

A glance at the last "Annual Report of Education" shows that woman has already won a high place, since out of 109,975 teachers in elementary schools over 20,000 are women, while in the 100 higher schools for females out of 1,561 teachers about two thirds are women.

Women Teachers

In considering the social conditions and the family life, we have seen that the two ruling virtues are loyalty and filial piety. We must never lose sight of these if we would really get into the hearts and homes of the people.

Two Great Virtues

The homes of the people are as different from English and American homes as are their customs and conditions of life. The houses are small cheap structures, usually one-storied, with heavy thatched roofs in the country and tiled roofs in the cities. Probably half of the houses in Japan did not cost, on the average, over $150, though there are, of course, some splendid dwellings, and some fireproof godowns.

Simple Homes

It is curious to see carpenters build a house. The first thing they make is the roof, which is set up on the ground. Posts are erected on stones that have been pounded into the earth, and the roof is then put up, piece by piece, on the posts. The strongest part of the house is the roof. One or two sides of the building are made of plaster over a bamboo lath work, the other sides being used for sliding paper

How Houses Are Built

doors, outside of which are sliding rain-doors. Such houses are not well braced, and hence are easily thrown down by heavy earthquakes, or blown down by typhoons.

How They Are Furnished

These shells of houses, with their inch-thick mats and their few rooms, capable of being thrown open into one large room, are very nice in warm weather, but since there are neither chimneys nor stoves they are very cold in winter. Charcoal fires in braziers help to make the rooms cheerful, and sitting on one's knees helps to keep one warm. The mats are the main furniture, for you sit, eat, work, and sleep on them. It is important to notice that every purely Japanese house has its god-shelf, where ancestral tablets are kept, and where various gods and charms are placed for worship, or for good luck.

Rise in Cost of Living

Rice and fish are the two staffs of life, and a Japanese boy can make way with these articles of food with chopsticks, faster than two Western boys could do it with knives and forks. It is astonishing how little it costs to support a family. A household, among the lower classes, consisting of five persons, can live on five dollars a month, and a student away from home can get along with from four to seven dollars a month. But the standard of living is rising. American wheat flour is being imported by shiploads. Beef, potatoes, cabbages, turnips are being added to the diet, and strawberries and ice-cream are favourites with those who can afford them. Even cheese, which the Japanese as a race dislike, has a few patrons. Oranges and persimmons are excellent, and the miserable apples, pears, peaches, and figs of the land have been made over by modern methods into very nice fruits.

The graceful and expensive Japanese clothing has been wholly given up as a public dress by multitudes of officials, teachers, soldiers, and business men, who now appear in European clothes. The middle and lower classes, men and women alike, mainly cling to the inexpensive kimono. The upper class women do not take to Western styles of dress, but continue to wear the broad and expensive sash with gowns that do not show the form of the body. And although they do not wear hats and bonnets, their hair ornaments are rich and costly. Mr. Fukuzawa used to say that the three strangest sights on earth are the wasp-waists of Western women, the deformed feet of Chinese women, and the black teeth of Japanese women. The custom of blackening teeth has gone out of fashion.

The people are exceedingly fond of amusements. They have no rivals in flying tailless kites. Young men love fencing and wrestling, and students especially take to baseball, tennis, boat races, and bicycles. Their social amusements are inferior to those of Europeans, since their music is inferior, and men and women do not mingle as in the West. Theatres abound where families go, carrying their lunches and staying all day, listening to some stirring historical play, and between scenes visiting friends in neighbouring boxes. Men play chess a great deal, and vie with one another in writing verses or dashing off ink pictures. Card playing has come to stay, although gambling is strictly prohibited. When the flower season opens, all the people, old and young, throng in gay dresses to the parks and groves, and drink in the beauty of the delicate blossoms that adorn the branches and that, falling, cover the ground.

Difficulties in Learning
Japanese

Japanese is probably the most difficult to master of all the languages of earth. It is the despair of foreigners, for it is virtually two languages combined—Chinese and Japanese. Moreover the spoken language is markedly different from the written. So far as the “characters” go, there are only forty-eight syllables, but when besides these one must learn two or three thousand Chinese ideographs in order to read Japanese literature, the task is greatly increased; and, as these ideographs are marvellously abbreviated in letter-writing, it is impossible to recognize them without learning them anew. Thus there are three distinct departments of the language—the spoken, the book, and the letter language. Besides all this, the spoken language is of two kinds, in one of which Japanese words predominate, while in the other Chinese words are more numerous. As though that were not bad enough, the order of words is almost the reverse of the English order. We think our personal pronouns a very essential part of our language, but the Japanese care so little for them that they have almost none. We have prepositions, they have only post-positions. We rejoice in our little articles, a, an, and the, they have none. We are very careful of our singular and plural numbers, they care so little for them that unless there is some special reason for specifying, they are left indefinite.

It is sometimes said that everything in Japan is just the opposite of what it is in the West, and the language is a good illustration of this. Our books begin from the left, theirs from the right. We read across the page, they read from top to bottom. The order of the first sentence in the Lord's prayer is: "Our Father who art in heaven," their order is: "Heaven in art of us Father." These facts will serve to show how impossible it is for a foreigner to fully master this language.

Among missionaries, those who devote themselves exclusively to English teaching usually do not learn the language, except enough to get along with the people they employ. Others make it their aim to master the spoken language only, and of these many acquire it so well that they take their place with educated Japanese in public addresses. But few indeed are they who can read as easily as a native, and perhaps there is not one who can excel in the three departments, namely, speak, read and write, as an educated Japanese does.

Old Japanese Literature

Every nation has its literature, in which are embodied its history, laws, religion, poetry, and lives of heroes. But the Japanese did not know letters until intercourse with China through Korea brought the new knowledge, and their first book was not written until about 700 A. D. Then Buddhism became popular, and among the blessings it brought was a love for literature. Books began to multiply and were printed from wooden blocks. So when Japan came in touch with Europe 300 years ago, Western learning was welcomed, especially works on medicine and war. And when, in these latter days, Japan opened her doors freely to foreign intercourse, the literature of the West at once began to have a profound influence on the nation. So wide-sweeping is this influence in every department of literature, that Prof. B. H. Chamberlain says: "The recent opening of the country was the death-blow to Japanese literature proper." In other words, recent literature is dominated by Western thought. Such books as Smiles' "Self-Help" and Mill's "Liberty" were translated and had an immense circulation. Young men who went abroad and saw Western nations, threw their whole souls into writing up the governments, laws, religion, education, customs, defects, family life, position of woman, commerce, manufactures, banking, and all the resources of foreign lands. So that the literature of the Meiji Era is so wholly different from all that preceded it, both in form and thought, that if men of a hundred years ago were to come back to life, they would be wholly at a loss to understand either the books of to-day or the language of new Japanese orators.

This cordial welcome of Western thought means a like welcome to Western education. Before the opening of the country, learning was confined mainly to the Samurai, and the schools were in the temples and houses of teachers of Chinese. Education was for the few, and the masses, especially the women, were ignorant. But a gifted and open-minded Japanese, A. Mori, was Minister in Charge at Washington in the "seventies," and he was so deeply impressed with our public and private schools, that on his return to Japan he gave his very life to the establishment of a system of national education. He accomplished his great work, but he fell by the hand of a misguided assassin on the day the Constitution for which he had struggled was promulgated.

Growth of Government Schools

This compulsory educational system has its faults, but it remains one of the most conspicuous signs of the rapid progress Japan has made. A brief table will best show what is going on:

For the year 1905-6.	No. of Schools.	No. of Teachers.	No. of Pupils.

Some Subjects Studied

Of the 5,348,213 pupils in the elementary schools, about 3,000,000 are boys and the rest girls. Western languages have a high place in middle, higher, and university institutions. Seventy-one foreign instructors were employed in 1906, of whom thirty-four were English and American, and nineteen German. The English language is by far the most popular of foreign tongues. Chinese, which used to be the key to all education, is more and more cut down in the elementary schools, only 1,200 ideographs being in that course. Ethics are, of course, taught, but it is the policy of the Government, at the present time, to exclude all religious instruction from the public schools.

What is said above refers wholly to Government schools. Private schools have no such standing in Japan as in the United States, yet they are gaining more and more recognition, there being 1,315 schools with 85,000 pupils. Among these are the two universities in Tokyo, founded by Mr. Fukuzawa and Count Okuma, which are doing excellent work. Religious instruction is not forbidden in the private schools.

Private Schools

There is, perhaps, nothing more difficult than accurately to state in a few words the leading traits of any great nation. Yet, after nearly thirty years' residence in Japan, I do not hesitate to place first and foremost, open-mindedness as the main characteristic of the people. But for this, New Japan would have been an impossibility. But for this, there would have been constant misunderstandings, resulting in hatred of the West and consequent wars, just as there were in China. But Japan saw at once the military and naval superiority of the West, and though the Samurai loved their swords and called the use of guns cowardly, they unhesitatingly remodelled their military establishments after those of the West. They perceived the superiority of constitutional government over an absolute monarchy, and so changed from the lower to the higher and better form. They recognized the evils of the old classes of society, and abolished them all, admitting even the outcast Eta and Ainu to the rights and privileges of the new order. Education they made universal. Their love of knowledge and readiness to sacrifice everything for it, show a people with minds open to truth in a rare degree. The Japanese are doing just what the young Emperor authorized in his celebrated edict—"seeking for truth in all the world."

Imitative yet
Original "Yes, but they are nothing but apes after all. They know only how to imitate," some critics have said. True, they fortunately have the imitative faculty in a high degree, but they are by no means mere imitators. They adapt whatever they adopt, so that it becomes peculiarly Japanese. To be sure, they sometimes make ludicrous mistakes, especially in minor things, as when a band of musicians strikes up "Marching through Georgia" at a Buddhist funeral, or a guest at a foreign table swallows his ball of butter at one gulp, or drinks the whole bowl of gravy thinking it is soup.

Another prominent characteristic is their love of morality. It is often said that the Japanese are liars. True, when they first came in contact with Western peoples whom they hated and feared, they did lie. Our first consul, Townsend Harris, wrote, "The Japanese are the greatest liars on the earth." But what consul or foreign minister would think of speaking such words now? All the diplomatic relations with Japan are as reliable as are those between Western nations. Yet in commercial matters it is well known that they often break their contracts, and among merchants there are many who bring reproach on the whole nation by their false dealings.

Now nobody knows this defect better than the Japanese themselves. And nobody deplores it so much as the moral leaders of New Japan. Again and again have I read in the native papers most earnest appeals to the merchant class to cease every form of dishonesty and to be thoroughly honourable in all their dealings. And in spite of the trickery and occasional deception of a whole community, and in spite of the suspicion that society is infected with bribery, the moral nature of the better part of the people, together with the new moral standards from abroad, before long, we may reasonably hope, will make the commercial reputation as good as that which the country enjoys in the realm of diplomacy.

A Noble Martyr

Other bad things are said against the Japanese, with more or less truth. But yet, a nation whose history has so many moral heroes, cannot be bad at heart. Japan has produced one man who gave his life to save the people of his province from oppression and ruin. He was cruelly crucified, his innocent wife with him, and their children were barbarously executed before the parents' eyes. Yet this man's dying words on the cross were: "Had I five hundred lives, I'd gladly give them all for you, my people." So far as I know, there is no other story in all history so closely resembling that of the crucifixion of Christ as this. The nation that can produce one such hero has the potency and promise of noble morality. This fearlessness of death in the face of duty runs all through the history of the people, which tells of wives who willingly died for their husbands, of children for their parents, of parents for their children, and of subjects for their lords. Where this spirit of sacrifice for others rules, there is a high grade of morality, even though it fails to make prominent the distinctively Christian virtues of chastity, benevolence, and truthfulness.

Influence of

If the young people who read this chapter finish it with the thought, that, although the Japanese have different customs and different standards of morals from ours, yet they certainly should not be called "heathen," nor regarded as unworthy of respect, then a good starting-point will have been made for a sympathetic understanding of the Japanese people. We will make a mistake if we begin this study by thinking that, as they are not Christian, they must be wholly wrong in all their moral and religious life. We should be, at least, as open-minded as they are and we should study them from the standpoint of their best traits, not from that of their worst.

Good Elements
in Eastern Religions

III

THE RELIGIONS

DR. A. M. FAIRBAIRN truly says that "He who would maintain the Christian religion must be just and even generous to all the religions created and professed of men." We should remember that these religions are the forces that lifted the East out of ancient savagery and made possible whatever of civilization there is. There must therefore be good elements in these religions. It is never fair to pick out only the bad and say: "Here is ancestor-worshipping Shintoism, and idolatrous Buddhism, and atheistic Confucianism. See what degrading customs and demoralizing superstitions they foster!"

We would not like to have Japanese treat Christianity in this way, for they might retort: "See how Christian power forced opium on China, and how rivers of liquor are consumed by Westerners, how crime flourishes, how hundreds of negroes are lynched, how divorces increase, and how every daily paper reports shameful things!" So we should be fair, and do as we would be done by. The right way.

is to show the good side of these religions before we venture on needed criticisms. Or, we may think thus: "The religions that developed Old Japan up to the point where New Japan became possible, may be, in the providence of God, preparatory to the reception of the Christian religion, which we firmly believe is the only complete way given under heaven whereby all men may be saved."

Oldest Religion of Japan

The oldest religion of the Japanese is Shinto, "The way of the gods." Wherever you go, in every town and village, you see the artistic tori-i, the gateway to the shrine. The Japanese never thought of making the tori-i into jewelry, but the jewelry-loving people of the West saw at once the value of this shape for ornamentation, so that it now appears in the West in hair-pins, breast-pins, and picture frames. Massive tori-i made of granite monoliths or cast in bronze are among the sights of this beautiful country. The word shrine should always be used when speaking of Shintoism, and temple when referring to Buddhism. For the Japanese words are different. A Japanese never speaks of a Shinto temple, or of a Buddhist shrine. The shrine is small and plain, and has no preaching hall, while the temple is large and ornamented, and always has images in the spacious preaching hall.

Shinto is first of all a system of ancestor

worship.¹ It certainly was an invaluable moral aid in the early history of the people. Men must worship something, and what can be better where there is no knowledge of the one loving and true Father of all men than for children to believe in the continued life of the parents who loved and reared them? And in barbarous ages would not this worshipful love help to create the family, and to regulate marriage and divorce, and succession, and thus give stability to the family and to society? Would it not also deepen faith in the future life, and so tend to dignify human life? The beautiful words of Prof. Y. Hozumi, of the Imperial University, in Tokyo, who boasts that he is an ancestor worshipper, are worthy of record: "We firmly believe that our ancestors, other than their bodies, do not die. They are immortal. The spirits of the fathers and mothers who loved their children, even though their bodies have perished, still in the other world live and watch over their descendants."

As a part of this belief, the Imperial Line was viewed as beginning with the sun-goddess, Amaterasu, and the people regarded themselves as descendants of this line of gods. Without this belief in the divinity of their Emperor there could have been no such Japanese nation as we now see. The great Ise shrine, dedicated to Amaterasu, is to the Japanese what Jerusalem was to the Jew. Every Japanese longed to visit this sacred place and worship at the fountainhead of the nation's life. I visited this shrine once and was deeply impressed with the sight of an old man who had come a long distance for the privilege of worshipping once before his death. He reverently kneeled at the gateway, and, with his head bowed to the stone step, prayed his heart-felt prayer of one word: "Arigato, arigato"—I thank Thee, I thank Thee! Even to this day it is taught in the elementary schools that one of the great duties of life is to make a pilgrimage to the Ise Shrine. Add to this the moral teaching that every one owes a vast debt of gratitude to the parents who nourished him and suffered for him, and that worshipping them is a law of heaven and a part of filial piety, and it is evident that such teaching must have been of no little value.

But what shall we say of the defects of Shinto? There are indeed too many of them, for this religion includes also nature worship. That is, they make a god out of anything and everything. As you ride in a jinrikisha through the country, you see here and there stone monuments engraved with the words, "The mountain god," "The horse god," "The river god," "The tree god," "The fox god."

Eight Million
Gods and Goddesses

All nature is alive with gods and goddesses, from the sun and moon in heaven, to the hills and groves and animals of earth. There is no use in trying to count up the objects of worship, they are all lumped in one phrase: "The 8,000,000 gods and goddesses." Gods were so much more numerous than men, that the people called these beautiful islands "Shinkoku," "The land of the gods."

With this came all sorts of superstitions and charms, and even licentiousness. You can go to one shrine and worship a snake, and by paying a sen or two you can draw lots, which will bring you good or bad luck. You go to another shrine and pray the patron god to heal your ailing eyes, and make a vow to do something nice for the god of the hot spring in case he grants your petition. The seven gods of luck are famous in the art of Japan, two of which are common in almost every house. Their names are Daikoku and Ebisu, and you can buy them in brass or wood, or even minutely engraved on a kernel of rice. It must be added, however, that these superstitions sit lightly on the people, and they laugh at themselves for this semi-religious nonsense.

Of course, the new thought from the West that has flooded Japan has wrought some great changes in Shinto. The open-minded leaders of the people quickly saw that the filth of

Degrading
Superstitions

70 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

Shinto must be abolished. One edict went forth like a heavy sledge-hammer, and knocked Shinto Reforms into powder the grossest forms of worship. The new education has almost killed the worship of sun and moon. But what is of most significance, conductors of the great Ise Shrine, seeing that it could not successfully compete with real religion, have converted it into a purely secular organization, whose main business it is to nourish the spirit of reverent patriotism. The disestablishment of what was one of the most popular of the shrines is deeply significant of the increasing influence of Christianity in Japan.

The use of Shinto in the army must be mentioned. We Westerners have costly monuments to commemorate the sacrifices and glorious successes of the soldiers who died in the service of their beloved land. In Japan also monuments are erected to the memory of the brave soldiers who died for Emperor and country. But these monuments are called "Shokonhi" ("calling together the spirits of the dead"). I have often witnessed the ceremonies at which Shinto priests, officiating at a small shrine before a monument, offer sake, vegetables, flesh, and rice to the spirits of the departed, after which the regiments, drawn up in companies before the shrine, salute the dead with a bugle call.

Monuments to Soldiers

We need not delay longer on Shinto except to quote from the Japan Evangelist, Vol. VII, p. 206 : "Shinto will linger and continue to attract thousands of worshippers to its shrines, but it is doomed to die. Amaterasu, the sun goddess, will still have her votaries here, as had Apollo in Greece and Rome; but the rays of the Sun of Righteousness will dispel the darkness of this myth. The farmers will continue to worship the rice god, and sailors and fishermen will still worship the god of the seas. But they will gradually learn of the Almighty, who sendeth seed-time and harvest, and who ruleth the wind and storms."

Shinto

Next to Christianity, Buddhism is the most powerful religion in the world. It pervades all the great nations of the East, and is said to be at its best in Japan. It is a very difficult task to study Buddhism. I have inquired of scholarly priests what Life of Shaka they would recommend me to read, and always their frank replies are like this: "There is no reliable Life of Shaka to recommend. You have an advantage over us there, for you have your four Gospels, but Shaka's life has to be gathered from various books and is not in shape to offer an inquirer."¹

Buddhism

in Japan

¹ Since writing the above, a "Life of Shaka" has appeared, written by Inoue Tetsujiro, Professor in the Imperial University. Owing to its timely comparison of Christ with

72 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

We know, however, that Shaka did one noble act that will forever stand to his praise.

Shaka's Sacrifice He renounced his high birth and his heirship to the throne, and became poor that he might find a way of deliverance for the people. We know that he had a big heart of compassion for all sufferers, and that he loved a life of purity. And when he died at a ripe old age, the adoring disciples of the saintly man worshipped him as a divine incarnation.

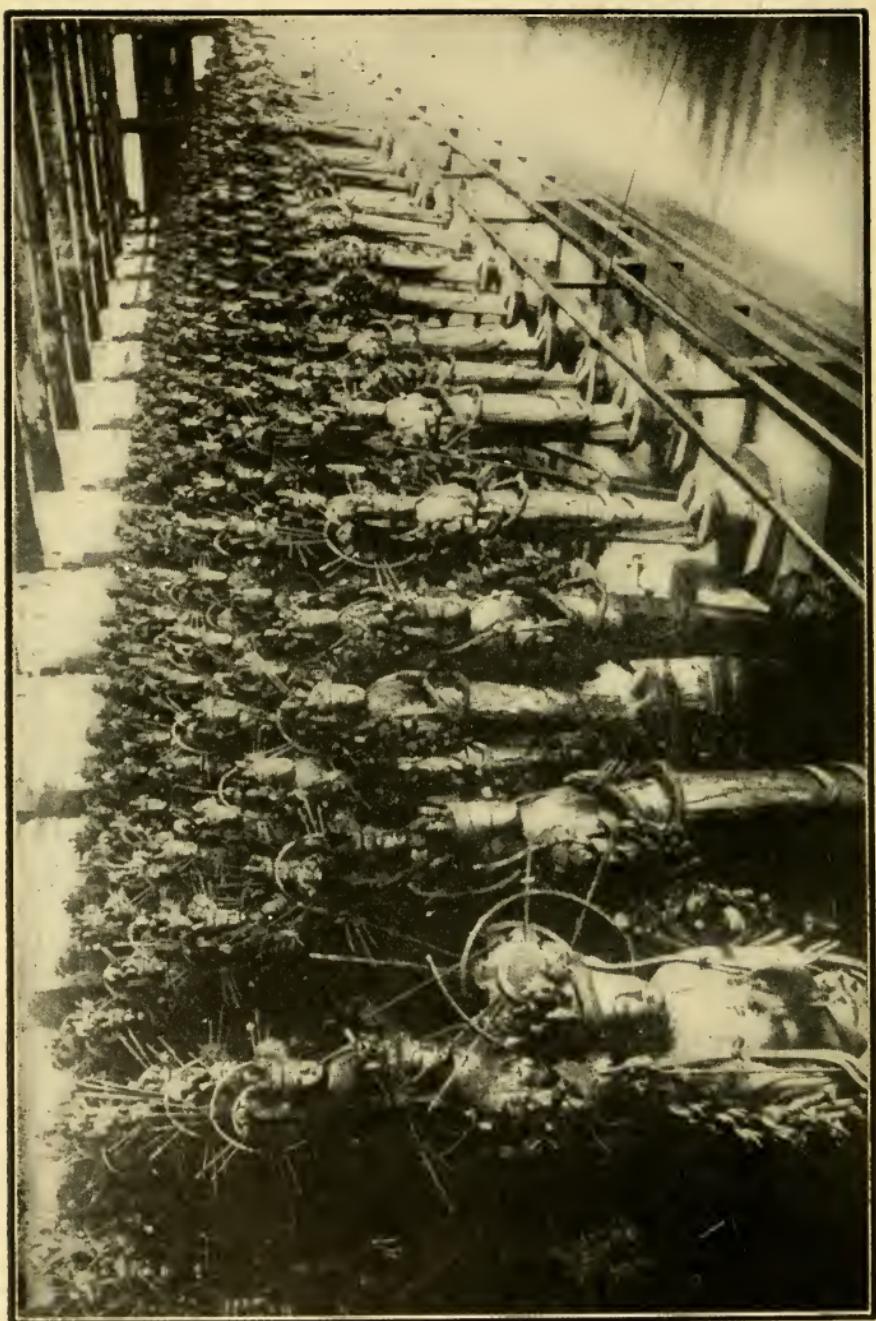

His religion as it appears in Japan with its dozen sects, its splendid temples, its scholarly priests, and gorgeous rituals, attracts the attention of every student of this country. The

Two Kinds of Buddhism two sides of Buddhism that impress the inquirer are, its strong intellectuality, and its weak ignorance. There are many scholars who profess Buddhism, but when you ask what they believe, it turns out to be more of a

A Philosopher's Creed philosophy than a religion. If I were to condense it into one sentence, this would be a fair statement: They believe in no Creator, but accept an endless evolution, with unerring causes and effects; and man can escape from the wheel of necessity and the evils of existence only by being absorbed back into the unconscious energy that pervades all things.

Shaka, it will impart much valuable information about Christ to non-Christian readers. But numerous Buddhists would wholly condemn this rationalistic "Life."

IMAGES OF KWANNON IN BUDDHIST TEMPLE, KYOTO
(One thousand images, five feet high, loaded with smaller ones, making a total of 33,333)

The point to remember is, that the one thought educated Buddhists repel is that of a Creator. "Who made Him?" is their sceptical question. They much prefer the endless chain of cause and effect to any self-existent First Cause.

So much for the scholarly Buddhists. But when we come to the masses, what do we find? The first objects that capture our attention are the temples and the images before which worship is performed. There is the splendid bronze Daibutsu of Kamakura, into whose head and nose tourists for a small fee are permitted to climb. There is the great Nara Daibutsu, fifty-three feet high, that has stood for 1,150 years. Then come innumerable images of Shaka, followed by those of Kwannon, the Merciful; of Amida, the deity of Boundless Light; of Jizo, the Compassionate; of Fudo, the Wise; and of Koshin, amusingly represented by three monkeys.

Amida is the object of worship in the imposing Hongwanji temples, the chief of which is in Kyoto. The creed of this sect resembles Christianity in one respect, it makes faith the most important thing. Their creed says: "Our salvation is settled the moment we put our faith in Amida." All that is required is to invoke his name as a sign of gratitude, but "prayer for happiness in this life is not allowed, as the events of life are all under a rigid necessity. To love others, live an orderly life, and obey the laws are enjoined."

How Mercy is Taught

Kwannon, the goddess of mercy, shows what a strong hold Shaka's teaching of pity has on the East. It is a noble virtue, and its wide reception has wrought a great work in modifying the cruel and savage instincts of semi-civilized man. Many beautiful stories of Kwannon's saving power in times of distress and peril are told, and there is no doubt that the moral nature has been thus enriched.

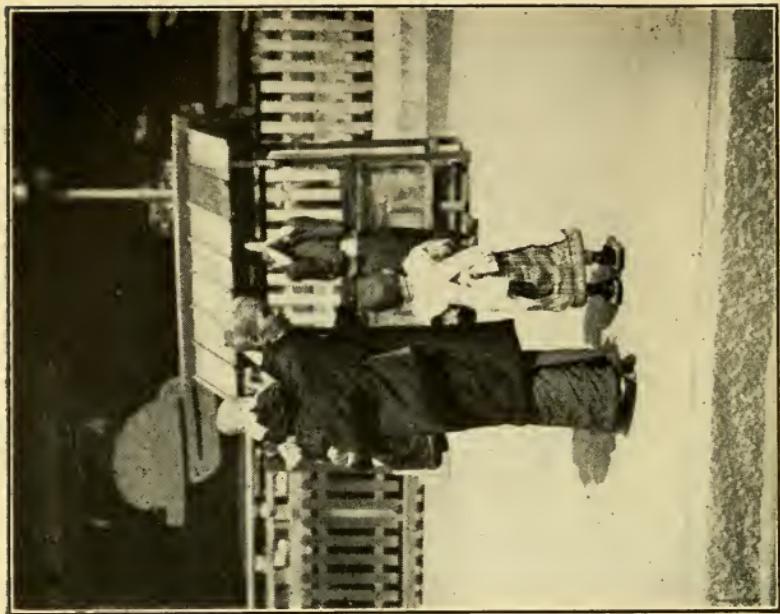

Fudo, the god of wisdom, enveloped in flames of fire, is another important incarnation. The uplifted sword in one hand, and the rope with which to bind criminals in the other, are symbols of justice and of punishment for the wicked.

Monkey Moralists

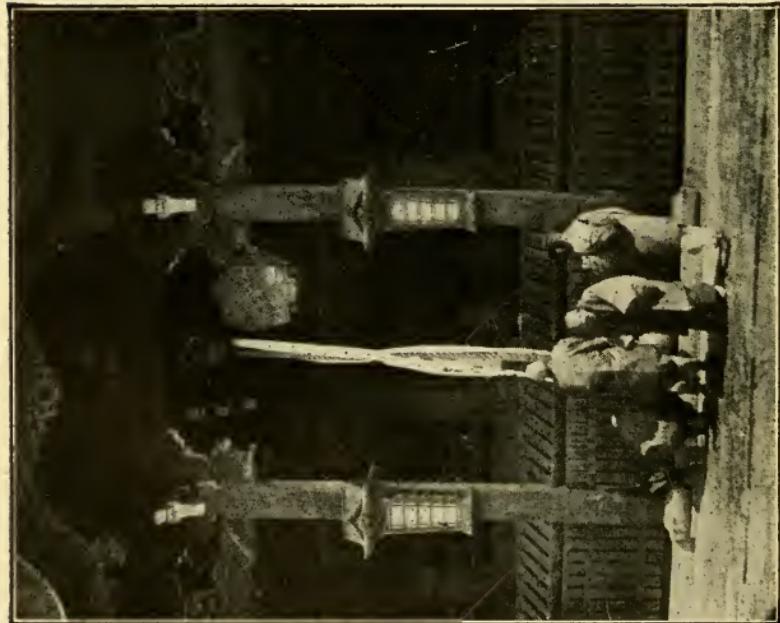

The three monkeys make an amusing spectacle as moral instructors. Their hands cover eyes, mouth and ears, thus teaching that there are some things you should not see, some you should not say, and others that you should not hear.

But side by side with many beautiful teachings of benevolence and self-denial and compassion, there are countless forms of superstition in open sight all through the land. While many simple-minded people doubtless sincerely pray for divine aid, their supplications are mainly for material and bodily assistance. They have prayer-beads strung together, with which to count off the hundred or thousand times the name of Amida has been repeated. In temples and by the roadside there are prayer-wheels, by turning which you "get blessings for the dead." To put pebbles on Jizo, secures, it is said, his aid on your journey and comfort for your children. I once saw a sad mother ask a priest to pray for her dead child; he thereupon rang a bell, chanted some ancient words, not one of which the poor mother could understand, then gently touched her head with the end of the bell-rope, and received his pay. I have seen old women, bent with age and pain, go to the temples and rub the stomach of the god Binzuru, then rub their own, believing that this deed would cure what the doctors had failed to relieve. The worst of it is that hosts of priests encourage the purchase of charms of all sorts, even though they themselves know, by the new light that has come, the utter futility of the trash they sell.

WORSHIP

There are scholars who love philosophy, and who are thoroughly well aware of the gross deceptions practiced on the ignorant classes, but who urge that the deep truths of Buddhism can never be understood by the common herd, and so the best way is to use idols and prayer machinery and charms, indeed any symbol that the untaught mind can grasp. They virtually seem to say: "Let them worship these beautiful idols reverently, and repeat the blessed name of Amida thousands of times, and hang up charmed symbols that catch their eyes every time they go in and out of their houses. It really gives them comfort, and it is for them the best way, though we know there is nothing in it."

I regret to write these things, for I am personally acquainted with many excellent young priests, who are really anxious to aid the people. But among leading Japanese there are those who use much stronger condemnatory language than any missionary would care to do. They see with deep regret the degrading superstitions that Buddhism fosters, and they lash the priests mercilessly. Some of these persons disavow all religion, and say that there is no need of any religion among educated people, but since it is a necessity for inferior minds, it should be made as rational as possible. There is no especial need for missionaries to attack Buddhism, for the Japanese themselves are constantly doing it much more effectively than foreigners can do. Here is a sample of how it is done. The words are taken from an address by Baron Kato Hiroyuki, formerly President of the Imperial University:

Attitude of Leading
Japanese

University
President's
Criticism

"The priests are indeed a rotten set and they themselves have the greatest need of reformation. They are absolutely unable to save the masses, and are moreover a peril to society. It is a sad and grave question how to deal with them. Of course their corruption is not a child of to-day, it is the accumulations of ages and has reached the climax now. Christianity is very different. There are bad priests there too, but it is marvellous—the zeal of the majority of them. Christian doctrines are hardly worth looking at, but the men who propagate them are good and helpful to society. The prime thing in religion is the men who uphold it, not the religion they uphold. The priests of to-day are evil fellows, and the damage they are doing to society cannot be condoned."

I must add one more criticism taken from the Nippon, one of the ablest papers of Tokyo. In an editorial on "Stirring up Buddhist Priests" there is this sentence: "The reason our people are indifferent to religion is not because they are deficient in religious feelings, but because Buddhist priests have lost their religious earnestness. It is wholly their sin and their shame."

Nippon
Criticism

Equally damaging criticisms are very common. What is more significant still is the fact that among Buddhists themselves are

Better Priests Friendly

many reformers earnestly working to improve morals, and to make Buddhism a real power in the new life of Japan. The better and abler priests no longer hate Christianity as they did twenty years ago, but rather are learning from Christian methods how to maintain more fitly their own place. While writing this chapter, a learned priest called to invite me to speak with him in his temple on religion. He said that ten years ago he hated Christianity and missionaries, but that he had absolutely changed his opinions. He even plans to visit the United States and England to thank the people, first, for the political and civil blessings gained through intercourse with these countries, and secondly, for sending the Christian religion, which has revealed their faults and forced them to reform their lives. He confessed that educated Buddhists no longer believed in transmigration which makes the life of man the same thing as that of a snake or bird or beast, but that they now teach the modern doctrine of heredity.

Buddhist Reforms

Indeed there is a very strong reform movement in progress. Buddhists now have large schools, and even what they call universities, where their 9,000 students are taught modern science, where comparative religion is studied, and what is more remarkable, where Christian teachers are employed and the Bible is one of the text-books. Prominent Christians, and occasionally a missionary, are invited to lecture on the Christian faith. The methods of Christian work are carefully studied and adopted into Buddhism. Shaka's birthday is now being celebrated somewhat like our Christmas. Sundays are used for their preaching days in many places. Buddhist Young Men's Associations are formed, and the secret of Christian earnestness is being eagerly sought after.

Now let us look at Confucianism. This, indeed, is not called a religion, and yet it has so much to do with moulding the moral life of the people, and has aided Buddhism and Shintoism so much, that it is worthy to be classed with the religions of the country. Confucius lived in China 500 B. C., and gave to that nation the teaching that has made all generations since love and worship him.

Confucianism
as a Religion

The simplest way of gaining an understanding of Confucius's teaching is to take his "Five Relations," the first of which is that of "Lord and Retainer." This relation is the main controlling principle that has shaped the destiny of Japan. It really runs into a religious sentiment, for the Samurai worshipped his master almost as if he were a god. While there was much selfish and despotic use of power on the part of the lords, there were

"Lord and Retainer"

Some Noble Lords

also many instances of noble regard for the best interests of the people. I love to read such stories as that of Uesugi Yozan, Daimyo of Yonezawa, who, when he saw the distressed condition of the people, reduced his family expenses by four fifths, and wore cotton, and said his greatest desire was to be "the father and mother of the people." His instructions to his officers were: "Go with Jizo's mercy, but forget not Fudo's justice," and this shows how Buddhism helped this earnest Confucianist. He hated the evil influences of the harlot houses and abolished them all from his province. He said: "Clean moral homes are the basis of a nation."

Ieyasu
and his Enemies

Here is one more illustration of a moral power that occasionally came out of Confucianism. Ieyasu, the founder of the Shogunate, is regarded as perhaps the greatest hero Japan has produced. In his wars, his enemy, Mitsunari, was defeated, and fearing the revenge of Ieyasu's seven generals, he sent to Ieyasu for pardon. The desired forgiveness was immediately granted, but the seven generals were indignant that such an enemy should escape death, and remonstrated with Ieyasu. The proverb he quoted to them shows how near the best hearts in all ages are to Christ's "Love your enemies." His reply was: "Even a hunter will have pity on a distressed bird when it seeks refuge in his bosom."

It is natural that such ideal lords should have ideal retainers, whose lives were devoted to their masters. Sometimes this devotion took the form of killing one's self in order to accompany the dying lord on his lonesome journey to the other world. I write these words in sight of twenty-four tombs of the bravest and best of the ancient warriors of Sendai, who disembowelled themselves on the death of their prince. Occasionally this devotion took the form of rebuking the lord for some unworthy act, even when the advice would bring death to the faithful servant. For example, an aged retainer of a young Shogun saw with deep anxiety his youthful lord's frivolous life, his love of games and dances and flowers, and determined to arouse him to his duties as a ruler. So going to the palace, he noticed a most exquisite dwarfed cherry-tree in full blossom in a splendid flower-pot. He rather bluntly asked his lord to give him the cherry-tree. On being refused he seized the pot and dashed it, flowers and all, on the stone steps, saying: "You care more for things than for men." He expected death, but his lord saw the earnest purpose of his servant and repenting of his own frivolous life, forgave him. Indeed, this relation of lord and retainer has been a mighty power for good in building up the nation and in fitting it for true representative government.

Devotion of

“Father and Son”

The next relation is that of “Father and Son,” or, it may be more properly, “Parents and Children.” When we foreigners see the words, father and mother, we naturally think of the duties parents owe to their children; but Confucius placed the emphasis on the duties children owe to their parents. The father had almost absolute power over the life of his child. A man who had become a Christian told me how he had become a Christian told me how he had more children than he could support, and so one morning he took his baby boy to the canal to throw him in, but the little fellow’s confiding smile turned the father’s heart from its inhuman purpose. He took the babe back and educated him. He is now a pastor of an important church.

There were, of course, noble fathers and Parents’ Duties some splendid mothers who made every sacrifice for their children’s good. One of the first Christian novels of Japan tells of a widow, whose only son was a careless, aimless boy. His mother tried to inspire him with the lofty purpose of reestablishing their house, then in danger of becoming extinct. Her efforts were all in vain, until one day she took him to his father’s grave and kneeling there with him, sternly rebuked him in the face of the dead for his thoughtless life. Then drawing a dirk she handed it to him with this startling order: "Die, coward! Die with this dirk here and now! Then I will follow you!" In this way this Spartan-like mother aroused her boy so that he became a great and successful man. He never could cease to love and reverence her. He said: "The fire of my mother's face burned into my soul and gave me the supreme decision of my life. Therefore I am a worshipper of my mother." This represents some of the best traditions of Japanese family life, and with such a basis, it is easy to see how welcome with many is the Christian truth, which emphasizes the duties of parents and recognizes the rights even of children.

Christian
Emphasis on Both

The third relation is that of "Husband and Wife." Confucius expressly teaches that husband and wife are very "different" beings, which is in startling contrast to the teachings of Christ who called the twain "one." The husband of the East was carefully cautioned not to love his wife very much, as that showed an effeminate man. The kiss between husband and wife was wholly unknown, and when foreigners were first seen to show affection in this way, it was regarded as extremely funny. "Every time I see foreigners kiss, I catch a sick," said a student who was trying to air his English.

"Husband and Wife"

Marriage
Ideals

- Parent Before Wife Dr. Neesima once remarked to his students, as he was going abroad, that it was hard to leave his wife and parents. That he should have mentioned his wife before his parents was such a violation of Eastern thought as could have been occasioned only by long contact with Christian homes. The order grated on the ears of the young men who heard him.
- Worthy Women Nevertheless, woman in Japan is woman still. Nine empresses have sat on the throne. Many a woman has put an end to her life rather than see dishonor come upon herself or upon her husband's name. At times, the same lofty spirit that led the Samurai to die gladly for his lord, found the wife as willing to endure death for her lord, her husband.
- Divorces Decreasing There used to be seven reasons for divorce, but these have been greatly modified by the new laws. Ten years ago the proportion of divorces to marriages was one to three, but it has rapidly decreased to about one sixth. Japan is probably the only nation in the world where divorces are diminishing.
- Womanhood More Respected It is a pleasure to add that the women of Japan are recognizing as never before their own moral dignity. Married women have always been taught to call themselves by the inferior term of "concubine," but now they are beginning openly to protest against the use of this word. There is no more convincing proof of the wholly new position women are coming to take than the words of Prof. Inoue Tetsujiro, of the Imperial University. He says in a book that has gone through twenty-three editions, and is used in the public schools as a reference book: "The husband should not lightly seek his own good, but should think of the happiness of her who makes his vicissitudes her own. He should never regard his wife as a servant nor use her harshly. Rather, as his nearest and dearest companion, he should have a deep and compassionate love for her as long as she lives. This feeling should bind the two bodies into one heart as with an iron chain. When such families abound, the foundation of the home is secure." No Japanese could possibly have written such sentiments before the coming of Commodore Perry. It is one of the many gratifying testimonies to the effective manner in which the spirit of Christian morality is transforming Japan.

The fourth relation is that of "Elder and Younger Brother." The Japanese language has no word that means simply brother or simply sister. You have to say, "this is my elder brother," "my younger brother," "my elder sister," "my younger sister." This is because the family is built upon the up and down plan, and so every term used must show the relative position of the individual. The

"Elder and Younger Brother"

86 Sunrise in the Sunrise Kingdom

Elder Brother's Authority first-born rules the others almost as though he were the head of the household. The common exhortation even now is, "Be obedient to your father and"—one would naturally expect the next word would be "mother"—but it is not, it is "elder brother."

His Moral Responsibility The elder brother ranks first, but he also has corresponding duties and responsibilities. He is the heir not only of the fortune but also of the debts and other burdens of the whole family. He might be selfish and despotic and bring distress and ruin on the others, but there was a strong ethical idea that modified the assumption of selfish authority, and made the family a moral power in society. But it was not a home in our meaning of the term.

"Friends" The fifth relation is "Friends." It is in practice a narrow relation, and has no reference to mankind. "Confucius knew nothing of universal philanthropy" (Rein's "Japan," p. 447). What a friend owes a friend in the ordinary intercourse of life was the usual idea of friendship, but it had at times a nobler meaning:

Narrow Meaning of Friendship "Even a stranger is from the same great womb of nature, and hence is to be treated as a friend." How wide a meaning could be given to "strangers" would doubtless depend on circumstances. The idea of "foreigner" we know was not included, for foreign intercourse was forbidden on pain of death, and the father of the present Emperor had prayers offered up at the Ise Shrine that the barbarians from the West might all be driven into the ocean and expelled forever from the land of the gods.

Now shall we call these moral and religious systems wholly "false" when there is so much truth in them? Rather let us glory in all the good there is in these imperfect religions, and remember that "in every nation those who work righteousness are acceptable to God." God has never left these peoples of the East, but has been leading them up to this "fullness of time" when the fullness of truth, as revealed in Christ, is freely given unto them. While Shaka and Confucius were truly noble men who have wrought a mighty work for good, yet their work was in no sense final or perfect. Sir Edwin Arnold once said to a missionary, "One verse of the Sermon on the Mount is worth all the words of Shaka." If asked in what these systems have failed, the answers come at once :

"Broken Lights" of Christ

Failures

Masses
Neglected

1. They have failed to teach the worth and dignity of man. They teach the dignity of a few upper-crust men, and leave the masses to be servants and even slaves.
2. Not knowing the value of man, only despotic forms of government were possible, in which the words "Liberty" and

Liberty and Rights
Disregarded

"Rights" were not known. When these words were first heard in Japan some forty years ago they were regarded as perils to the State. These old religions never could have given liberty and rights to the common people and to Eta. Only a Christian civilization could have done that.

Woman Degraded

3. They did not give woman her true place. Some truly noble mothers have risen above their religious belief, but the mass of women were left in ignorance and in a kind of slavery.

Children Unappreciated

4. And the children—of course it was not known that they were of the Kingdom of Heaven, and that all, girls as well as boys, are worthy of being educated. Neither Shaka nor Confucius ever dreamed of calling a child and taking him as a text to teach needed lessons to their intellectual disciples. Christ alone knew the priceless worth of a little child.

Meaning of Sin Unfelt

5. And how can men, without a knowledge of a Holy God and a sinless Saviour, know what sin is? I saw a teacher once get red-hot with anger on being told that he was a sinner. An evangelist preaching in Tokyo said: "All men are sinners." Instantly he was challenged by an over-loyal fellow who indignantly inquired, "Is His Majesty the Emperor a sinner?" And grasping a chair he proceeded to knock such ideas out of the preacher's head until a policeman appeared. Those who have come near to Christ in this land are quick to see what they could not see before, that the coming of Christ to Japan has given a new and deep meaning to the old word "sin." They then begin to understand the need of the Gospel message, "Repent."

6. And, after all, is not the prime defect their ignorance of God, the Creator, the Father, the Saviour? How can men who know not God know their own destiny, and know how to be saved from sin?¹

THE FIRST AND SECOND COMING OF CHRISTIANITY

THERE are two wholly distinct periods of First Coming of Christianity Christian missions in Japan. The first was begun by the earnest and successful Xavier in 1549, and was, of course, wholly a movement of the Roman Catholic Church. Xavier himself was in Japan but a very short time, less than two years, but he started a work that other priests carried on for nearly a century with extraordinary results. "In little over half a century the Christians numbered nearly one million, the highest figure ever attained in Japan."

But one trouble with this great missionary movement was that it was a kind of political Christianity. Japan was in a very unsettled state and wars between the Diamyos were devastating the land. Buddhist priests had their strong, fortified temples on mountains and in cities, and were warriors quite as much as they were religionists. They were a hard lot to manage, and the leading general, Nobunaga, fought them savagely, burning their three thousand temples on Mount Hiei near Kyoto, where now missionaries camp out during the hot months. For political reasons this general favoured Christianity, hoping thus to weaken the Buddhists. Certain southern daimyos also, for political reasons, joined the Christian movement, and some commanded their followers to become Christians, so that things went on with wonderful success for awhile. One and another of these daimyos sent embassies to Europe to examine the political situation, to meet the Pope, and study Christianity, and they brought back reports generally favourable.

But after Nobunaga, arose another great general, Hideyoshi, who scorned the ways and the teachings of the foreign priests and began bloody persecutions. These were indeed dark days for Japan. At last Ieyasu, the founder of the Shogunate, won the great battle of Sekigahara in 1600, and beheaded the Christian daimyos who had fought against him. Ten years later he discovered a treacherous correspondence on the part of a prominent Christian to betray Japan. He therefore ordered all Christians out of the country and commenced those terrible persecutions which resulted in stamping out of Japan all visible traces of Christianity. Tens of thousands were killed in the executions and battles that followed. This bloody chapter ended in tightly closing Japan to the outside world for 250 years, save one little island near Nagasaki where the Dutch could carry on their commerce.

We cannot dismiss this century of Christianity without a few explanatory statements :

1. This political form of Christianity was undoubtedly a peril to the independence of Japan. There were noble, self-sacrificing priests at work here, and among the converts high and low, there were some as true believers in Christ as could be found in Europe. But none the less, the work as a whole certainly threatened the peace and safety of the empire, by fostering rebellions and intrigues, so that the cruel order of extermination seemed to be the only method of safety in that age.

Peril to National Independence

2. Nowhere in the history of Christianity have converts endured persecutions with greater courage and firmness than in Japan. They were crucified and horribly mangled. They were burned and tortured in indescribable ways. Within a few blocks from the place where I write, the following edict was exhibited and similar ones were hung up in every important town :

Christians
“died in faith”

“ If any one is suspected of being a Christian, inform against him at once. Informers shall have the following rewards :

Hostile
Edict

“ For a Christian priest, 300 pieces of silver.

For a catechumen, 300 pieces of silver.

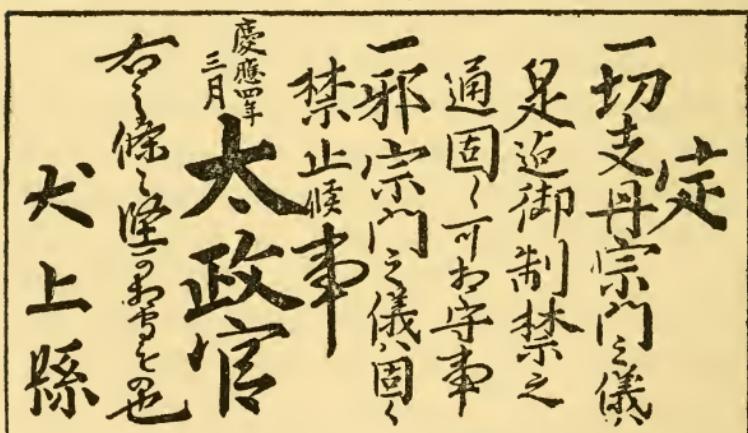

For one who has secretly returned home, 300 pieces of silver.

For one who has lived in the same house with a Christian, 100 pieces of silver.

If one informs concerning members of his own family, he shall have 105 pieces of silver.

If one conceals a Christian, his house and all local officials shall be severely punished."

I often pass by a little hill on which were executed thirty men, women and children who refused to deny Christ. The martyr blood has made that place so sacred in the eyes of Protestant Christians of the neighbourhood, that, when recently they were about to begin special revival services, they went out at sunrise to consecrate themselves to their work on this hill where so many gladly died for Christ.

A DECREE AGAINST CHRISTIANITY

The above copy of a decree of the Japanese Government against Christianity was originally written on a wooden board. This is the translation :

ORDER

Hitherto the Christian Religion has been forbidden, and the order must be strictly kept!

The corrupt religion is strictly forbidden!!

Done in the 3d month of the 4th [year] of Kyo (March, 1868).

By order of the Inugami Prefecture.

Japan was not alone in thus mercilessly stamping out this imperfect Christianity, for Europe was doing deeds equally barbarous with its abominable inquisitions and tortures for heretics. In no part of the globe had the people at that time risen to the idea of religious liberty.

Like European Inquisitions

3. In spite of these severe measures, there were thousands who clung in secret to their faith, handed down from parents to children. While we rejoice in their indomitable fidelity, it is pitiable to note the incalculable damage done to the spiritual nature by the enforced secrecy. These people had to enroll themselves as Buddhists or Shintoists. Their houses had the usual god-shelf, and their worship of the gods was apparently just like that of others. I know a farmer's home where a copper image of the Virgin Mary was kept during all these ages and passed down from father to son with this solemn injunction: "In this little box is a precious charm that if worshipped, unopened, will bring blessings to all the house. But if the least attempt be made to open the box, untold curses will fall upon all of you." Later, in days of liberty and enlightenment, the farmer ventured to open the box and out dropped the image. Faith thus secretly passed on, with no open teaching of God and of Christ and with no written Word of Life, could not possibly result in noble Christian characters.

Discipleship

Deep Prejudice Against Christians

4. The deep hatred of Christianity that was thus kept alive in the minds and hearts of the people for over two centuries is undoubtedly one of the causes, that, even at the present time, prevents its favourable consideration by the older people, especially in the interior. There is really nothing that they feared so much as this "Evil Religion." And, to this day, when a son away at school in the city writes to his parents in the country that he has become a Christian, he is indignantly warned not to bring that disgrace on his house on peril of being disinherited. So real an obstacle to the spread of the Gospel is the old prejudice that one of the leading statesmen of Japan, the Hon. Shimada Saburo, M. P., has recently published a book to show, that, while the political Christianity of three hundred years ago was a real peril to Japan, the Christianity of to-day, and especially Protestant Christianity, is not only not dangerous, but will bring great good to the people.

Second
Coming not Political

With this brief reference to the earlier coming of Christianity, we pass on to the beginning of modern missions, which, in spite of heavy drawbacks, is one of the most glorious chapters in the whole history of the Church.

For the Christianity that in recent years has come to Japan is not of the political kind. It is not backed by gunboats and the power of Western governments. At first the missionaries were suspected of being spies sent in advance to prepare the way for conquests and for seizures of territory. Every Japanese who had anything to do with missionaries was suspected of being a traitor. Plots were formed to assassinate prominent teachers of Christianity, in the firm conviction that the success of such schemes would benefit Japan.

Missionaries must, of course, have the protection of their home governments as much as merchants. So the first treaty with the United States in 1858 contained a clause securing to Americans the right to erect their own places of worship, and also a promise that the Japanese would abolish the practice of trampling on the cross. In international relations, religion is a very big question. The revised treaty between the United States and Japan gives the Japanese the right to build temples and shrines in the United States, and to worship Amida, Jizo, the three monkeys, or anything they like; while we Americans in Japan have the right of our worship with entire liberty of conscience.

Let us now consider some of the obstacles which confronted the first missionaries :

Treaty
Provisions
Just

Early Obstacles

Treaty Restrictions 1. They had very little liberty of movement. They could live only in the few open ports, and even there they were restricted to small plots of ground called "concessions." In the daytime they could go out twenty miles from home, but must return by night. No travelling in the interior was permitted without special passports. These restrictions were not wholly abolished until the treaties were revised in 1899. Threats from fanatical Samurai were not uncommon. Even as late as 1884, the missionaries in Kyoto received an anonymous letter full of murderous intent containing such sentences as these :

"To the four American Barbarians, Davis, Gordon, Learned, and Greene, bad priests, four robbers. You have come from a far country with the evil religion of Jesus, and as slaves of the Japanese robber, Neesima. You are deceiving the people with bad teaching, and we shall soon with Japanese swords inflict the punishment of heaven upon you. But we do not wish to defile the sacred soil of Japan with your abominable blood. Hence, take your families and go quickly." Now Japan is as free for residence and work as any other land.

2. Far worse than confinement in a concession was the inability to use the difficult language. Many of the early missionaries began to preach in a year or so, for great was their desire to tell the story of Christ. In those days I saw audiences listening with reverence and deep interest to these earnest efforts, but I found out in after years that the hearers knew very little of what the missionary was saying. For instance, at the close of a sermon on John the Baptist, portraying his courage, his lofty faith, and his sincerity, one of these apparently reverent hearers asked the missionary whether this John the Baptist was the name of a place or of a person! The Japanese are very polite, and indeed are the most sympathetic of listeners, but I have occasionally seen an audience nearly split its sides trying to hold in its laughter over some funny blunder, as when a missionary says "funeral" when he means "organization." I was once introduced to an audience thus: "Please listen respectfully to the foreigner. If you hear him say 'turtle' ('kame') remember that he means 'God' ('Kami')." There is no doubt that many a sermon has been preached on the "turtle." And so discouraging is this obstacle of the language that bitter tears have wet many a cheek in the prolonged struggle to master enough of it to tell in a worthy way the story of Christ.

But now there are numerous text-books and dictionaries and fairly good native teachers.

Work now Systematized All the large missionary societies have care fully prepared courses of study generally covering three years, with frequent examinations, so that newcomers have not to face such difficulties as those encountered by the early missionaries.

Evil Lives of Foreign Residents 3. Another obstacle that exists here, and in every great mission field, is the influence of evilly disposed foreigners. One of the first things that impressed me in landing in Japan was the contempt and even brutality which some of the foreigners showed toward Japanese. Without the slightest provocation, one of these haughty fellows wantonly struck my jinrikisha man across the neck with a heavy horse-whip, raising a welt of bruised flesh as thick as one's finger. To Japan come many worthy men and women, but there are also many of low morals and dissolute life. And the general impression among the Japanese is that these wicked people, too, are Christians, and that their lives are a product of Christianity.

Sins of Christendom This mistaken method of judgment is applied in a sweeping way to all so-called Christian countries. Even to-day the press of Japan contains accounts of the intemperance, gambling, divorces, murders, briberies, greed, and other evils, in Christian nations. I am more glad than I can tell that the question of human slavery was finally settled before I came as a missionary of Jesus. For the work of preaching the gospel of brotherhood would have been vastly more difficult, had I been a representative of a nation practicing the buying and selling of human beings.

A recent magazine writer says of Western Christianity: "It is an empty name, an empty faith, with empty houses of worship, and the priests and believers have empty hearts." When I read such statements, I think how true is the remark of an objector to Christianity. He said: "If you people of the West were only as good as your Book, we would all speedily accept your religion." Indeed, it is true that the greatest difficulty in getting Christianity believed in Japan, is that much of Western society is yet so feebly influenced by it.

Not as good as the Book

In spite of these and other obstacles, there have been many signal successes won by faith in the living God. But before mentioning these, it is well to bear in mind the political situation that has, in the providence of God, been a solid aid to the modern entrance of the Christian religion. I refer to the fact that Japan was opened without war. Let it be emphasized that, until the war with Russia, Japan was the only one of the great non-Christian nations that had not been compelled

Encouragements

Country
Opened
Without War

to fight with some Christian power. The bombardment of Kagoshima by the English, and the punishment of Shimonoseki, by the allied fleet, for firing on foreign vessels did not cause deep wounds. The respect shown by the Ministers of the United States and Great Britain for the rights of Japan has resulted in exceptional good-will toward these countries, and it is from these two nations that by far the larger number of missionaries come. So here in Japan there never has been any "Missionary question" troubling the Government, and exciting the people to acts of violence against Christian workers, and this is something for which we should be profoundly thankful.

Noble Pioneers

Now we come to the beginning of missionary work in Japan. The first missionaries landed in 1859, representing the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Presbyterian, and the Dutch Reformed, followed by the Baptists in 1860. These four were the only American missionary societies represented for a period of ten years. The English Church Missionary Society sent its first missionaries in 1869 and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in 1873. Among the pioneer missionaries were some who accomplished a wonderful work.

Dr. J. C.
Hepburn

J. C. Hepburn, M. D., LL. D., of the Presbyterian Church, was just the type of man for a pioneer. His medical knowledge, together with his gentle and tactful manner, large sales of medicines, and many cures, effectually removed prejudice against Christianity. He also published the first Japanese dictionary, a labor involving seven years of toil.

Dr. S. R. Brown of the Dutch Reformed Church powerfully influenced a number of young men through his school in Yokohama, the first English school in Japan. Among his pupils are some of the ablest Christian ministers and some of the prominent officials of the Empire.

Brown

Dr. G. F. Verbeck of the same mission will never be forgotten in Japan. His exceptionally wide range of knowledge and his rare ability to impart it gained him a high place as instructor in the beginnings of what is now the Imperial University. He was the trusted adviser of some of the highest officials who have done so much to make New Japan. He was the first foreign missionary on whom the Emperor conferred the decoration of "The Rising Sun," an honour given for his valuable services as a teacher. Since then, Bishop Harris, who is the widest known and best beloved missionary in Japan, has been twice decorated. And Dr. Hepburn on his eighty-eighth birthday was also remembered by the Emperor with a decoration.

Dr. G. F.
Verbeck,
Bishop Harris,
Dr. Hepburn

Such meagre notices of these splendid missionaries are wholly inadequate—even to indi-

Significant Results cate the good they accomplished, not only directly by their scholarly abilities, but also by their unselfish and devoted lives. It was the influence of such men that led a high official to write to the Shogun: "Western foreigners of the present day differ widely from those of former times. They are much more enlightened and liberal." If we bear in mind that during this decade the Christian religion was still prohibited, and that the penalty was death to any Japanese who became an open believer, or aided a missionary in translating the Bible, we can see what a vast gain it was to have such men as Drs. Hepburn, Brown and Verbeck recognized and their services sought by those in authority. Even as late as 1871, Mr. O. H. Gulick's teacher, Ichikawa, was imprisoned and rigorously punished till he died, because the Gospels of Mark and John were found in his house. His wife also was imprisoned seventeen months because she had not informed on her husband! Only six converts were baptized in the first ten years, but the foundations were laid for brilliant successes that were afterward to call forth thanksgivings from the Church of Christ on earth.

Great Difficulties

The work accomplished in the first decade seems all the more wonderful when we recall that it was the time of the American civil war. Dr. Verbeck indeed, was "a man without a country," the only one I ever knew of that kind; but he meant to become a citizen of the United States and his heart was with America in its great tribulation. All the missionaries laboured in sorrow not knowing when they might hear of the ruin of the great Republic, and the possible ending of their mission work. But God saved America and made surer still the foundations laid by the missionaries in Japan.

In Anxious Times

Perhaps among the successes of the next decade the highest place should be given to the translation of the New Testament. No mission work is on a safe basis until the Holy Scriptures have been translated in the vernacular in a style that will command the respect of the reading classes. It is revealing no secret to say that the first attempts of individuals at translation were wretched failures. A good translation of the Scriptures is one of the hardest tasks to which a missionary can apply himself. It was twelve years before the first Gospel was published. Then a committee of three, Drs. Hepburn, Brown and Greene, were appointed to translate the New Testament. Although they were aided by skillful Japanese scholars, it was nine years before the work was completed. The Old Testament was divided among a larger committee, but the final revision was committed to Drs. Hepburn, Ver-beck and Fyson, and ten years more were spent on this great work. It was, therefore, twenty-nine years (1888) when the glad announcement was made to a large audience of missionaries in Tokyo, that a complete translation of the Bible had been accomplished. Speaking on that memorable occasion Dr. Hepburn, chairman of the committee, who had devoted sixteen years of his life to this work, said, with deep emotion : "What more precious gift, more precious than mountains of gold or of silver, could the Christian peoples of the West give to this nation ? May this sacred book become to the Japanese what it has come to be for the peoples of the West, a source of life, a messenger of joy and peace, the foundation of a true civilization and of social and political prosperity and greatness.

It is not claimed that the translation is perfect, but it has been in circulation for twenty years with ever-increasing acceptance, and has been kindly praised by non-Christian native scholars as a model of style. It is anticipating a little, but it is a sign of the value that the Christians attach to this Bible that in 1898 they presented a richly-bound copy costing about $150 to the Emperor, through the hands of Count Okuma, then Premier.

An epoch-making event, not accomplished by missionaries, but none the less a preparation for Christianity, was the unexpected adoption by the Government of Sunday as the official rest-day. It happened on this wise. The Government employed a goodly number of foreigners in education and other departments, many of whom refused to work on Sundays. The foreign legations and consulates were closed on that day. Now the usual rest-days in Old Japan were only two a month, the first and the fifteenth. And it is said that Prince Iwakura, disliking to introduce any Christian custom, and yet hoping to please the foreigners, issued a generous edict announcing six government holidays a month. But the foreign employees, many of whom were earnest Christians, would not give up their Sundays, so that in some months these official rest-days, added to the Sundays, made as many as ten days when foreigners were absent from their posts. Threats to dismiss the offenders brought no change; and after two years of this confusion, the Government decided to conform to the custom of the West, and in March, 1876, boldly issued this edict: "It is hereby notified that up to the present time the first and sixth days have been observed in the Government offices as the days of rest. But hereafter all Government offices will be closed on Sundays."

It is hard to estimate the value this edict

Value to
Japanese
Christians has been to the Christians of Japan. Before it was issued it was impossible for the growing Christian community to attend Church with any regularity. While the majority of the people take little note of the day, it is known as the Christian's day for preaching and worship. Even Buddhist schools close on Sundays, and the priests, too, use this day for special preaching. The merchants have no rest-days at all, and the farmers still cling to their local days of rest, but with the spread of Christianity, Sunday will be to Japan the blessing that it has been to other nations.

FIVE FORMS OF MISSION WORK

WE have thus far noticed the high regard which the first missionaries won from influential Japanese, the scholarly victory these Christian pioneers gained over the difficult language, and their successful translation of the Bible. Moreover, the significant change in public opinion, and the adoption of Sunday as the Government rest-day, have made it possible to begin open and organized evangelization. In the glad words of the parable we can gratefully say, "All things are ready." God Himself had prepared Japan for friendly intercourse with Western nations and for the reception of the glad tidings of salvation through Christ.

Modern missions everywhere—and Japan is no exception—can be best understood by considering the five great divisions through which the work is carried on, Evangelistic, Educational, Medical, Literary, and Philanthropic. These are the five fingers of the great hand that shapes modern missions.

Five Great Divisions of Mission Work

I.—Evangelistic Work.

Evangelistic
Division—
First Protestant Church
in Japan

The first Christian Church in Japan was organized with eleven members by the Rev. James Ballagh in Yokohama, March 10, 1872. It was born in prayer. That in its membership there were nine students is indicative of the prominent part students have had in building up the Protestant Churches of Japan. The first article of their creed showed a positive purpose to keep the Church as free as possible from the sectarianism of the West: "Our Church does not belong to any sect whatever; it believes in the name of Christ in whom all are one; it believes that all who take the Bible as their guide and diligently study it are the servants of Christ and our brethren. For this reason all believers on earth belong to the family of Christ in the bonds of brotherly love."

Rapid Growth of Other Churches

The next churches were formed in Kobe and Osaka in 1874, in connection with the missionaries of the Congregational Church. The former consisted of seven men and four women, while the latter had only seven men. There is no more hopeful, enthusiastic missionary literature in existence than the letters written at that time by Messrs. Greene, Davis, Gordon, and others: "There are a dozen young men eager to preach the Gospel anywhere. All this region is open to the truth, so that our helpers can go anywhere among the millions of people and find willing listeners." "The work is pressing on us in every direction. We are expecting any morning to awake and find all Japan open to us, and wanting to come to us!"

These first Christians had very much the same spirit as those whose doings are recorded in the Acts. They felt themselves called to be witnesses for the Christ on whose cross their race, until recently, had trampled in contempt. In their enthusiasm they went here and there preaching to audiences large and small. They wanted no money from missionaries, being animated by the spirit of self-support and aggressive evangelism.

It is impossible in this little book even to mention the many bands of Christians that soon began to be formed in all the great coast cities of Japan. In the second decade, the number of believers increased so rapidly that in one year, 1879, 1,084 new members were added, making a total membership of 2,701 adults. After that, a fifty per cent. annual increase was not at all uncommon, and in some years as many as 5,000 were received into the churches. The gain during the third decade, 1879-1889, was 28,480, over ten times the entire number previously gained.

The growth in the fourth decade was not nearly so rapid, owing to causes that will be mentioned later; yet the new century opened with a total of 42,451 Protestant Christians, 538 churches, of which about 100 are self-supporting, and 348 groups of Christians not yet organized into churches. The contributions of these believers for the first year of the new century were 102,229 yen. The statistics for 1907 show that there are 57,830 Protestant Christians, who raised 274,608 yen, and whose church and parsonage property is valued at 1,535,905 yen, a large proportion of which was raised by the native Christians.

Present

Their Generosity

A most significant fact and one that serves to illustrate the healthy and vigorous growth of the Christians is that there are two wholly independent mission boards of the Congregational and Presbyterian Churches, which raise about 20,000 yen a year and support their own missionaries, some forty, at present. Self-support is a burning question in all mission fields, and one cannot understand the work without knowing something of its practical workings. This question early engaged the attention of the Christians, and the first to practice it was the Rev. Paul Sawayama, whose brief life is well told in a little book called, "A Modern Paul in Japan." He was the first Japanese to be ordained in Japan (Dr. Neesima was ordained in the United States), and he was the first to proclaim the necessity of self-support. It must have taken immense courage and exalted faith to attempt such a thing with only eleven members, all of whom were poor, save in their faith and in their love for their pastor. The Rev. H. H. Leavitt was his inspiring adviser and no other missionary in Japan thought the plan could succeed, but here is the surprising result as recorded in Mr. Sawayama's biography: "The Naniwa Church grew very rapidly. At the end of five years it had increased its annual contributions from $70 to $700. It had started another independent church in Osaka, and had made a beginning in nine other places. It had also established a Christian girls' school in the city."

A Modern

This magnificent beginning of self-support sent a thrill of surprise and delight throughout the little churches of Japan. The attendant arduous labours undoubtedly shortened Mr. Sawayama's life, but he worked believing that he ought to sacrifice everything for the sake of this principle. I know of two other evangelists who deliberately cut themselves off from foreign money, well knowing that their little bands could not possibly give them sufficient support. They preferred to suffer extreme poverty in order to plant the spirit of self-support and self-respect deep in the hearts

Sacrifice for Sake of Self-support of their followers; and their heroic determination cost them their lives. This self-sacrificing spirit of thousands of Christians is one of the surest proofs that the spirit of Christ is present with power in the rapidly growing church of Japan.

Growth of Japanese
Leadership

Some of these independent churches have a membership of over 500, and report annual contributions as high as 2,788 yen. In some of their pulpits no missionary is seen from one end of the year to the other. Some of the pastors' sermons are regularly published, and for stirring thought, deep sincerity, and living faith in God and Christ, they compare favourably with the best that are heard in city churches of Christian lands. It is this intellectual ability combined with loyalty to Christ on the part of the preachers, and the spirit of grateful giving on the part of the members that lead many missionaries to say: "Were the whole missionary force permanently withdrawn from Japan the good work would go on, and Japan would become a Christian nation." Were this to happen, however, the progress would not be so rapid.

II.—Educational Work.

Every large mission plans to open schools for boys and girls just as soon as possible, in order to train adequately equipped ministers and teachers. But before dealing with these Christian schools, I desire to call especial attention to the work of two Christian teachers in Government employ, far away from missionary centres. These are Capt. L. L. Janes in the southern island, and Pres. W. S. Clark in the northern island. Since it was my good fortune to know both men and to hear from their own lips their unique experiences, I am all the more glad to record what they accomplished in the extremes of the Empire.

Two Pioneer
Christian
Teachers

In 1872 Captain Janes, formerly an instructor in West Point, was employed to found a school in Kumamoto. He was an able teacher and an earnest Christian, inspired with the one aim of securing the highest welfare of his pupils and of extending the Kingdom of God. Every Saturday night he read the Bible with a band of students, who came to study English and also to "find holes" in the Christian teaching. But the Gospel finally found its way into their hearts, and one after another confessed his faith in the risen Lord, so that in three years there was a band of thirty believers.

Band of Christian
Students

The island of Kyushu was of all places in Japan the most turbulent over the coming of foreigners and the inhabitants were strongly dissatisfied with the new Government. There were excited Samurai who longed for a chance

Deadly Plot to cut off Captain Janes's head, and they showed their disposition by spitting at him on the streets. When it became apparent that some of the students had really become believers of the hated religion, there was no mistaking the murderous purpose of the fanatical Samurai. A company was formed to kill all the converted boys on a certain night, but the plot was discovered just at dusk. With blanched faces the youth went to the captain's house crying, "We're all to be killed to-night!" "Very well," cheerfully replied the captain. "Then you'll all be in Heaven to-night, and I'll be there with you! Get your swords, and I'll take my revolvers." The director of the school was sent for and sternly asked why he permitted the plot. The culprit denied his guilt but the captain decisively said: "I know it all, and you're at the bottom of it. If a single hair of these boys' heads is injured, off comes your head first of all."

Sequel This effectually prevented the intended slaughter of the young men who did not, however, escape bitter persecutions. Together they dedicated themselves to God on a hill overlooking the castle, and from that consecrated band came one of the most powerful Christian movements Japan has yet known. Alas, some of that gallant group lost their faith completely, and Captain Janes himself, in later years, fell away and tried to undermine the faith of those whom he had so inspired. Other members of the band gained high positions in Government service, and some are pastors of influential churches, and men of power, known and honoured abroad as well as at home.

President Clark did his work in Sapporo in 1876. When General Kuroda, Vice-Governor of Hokkaido, escorted Dr. Clark to Sapporo to found the Agricultural College, the question arose as to the best method of teaching morals to the students. Dr. Clark declared the Bible to be the best text-book, but the general strongly objected to the use of any Christian literature in the school. Dr. Clark then requested that some one else should be asked to teach morals, but the general, who had set his heart on having Dr. Clark take this branch also, said, "You go ahead and do it in your own way." And so the Bible was at once put into the hands of the twenty-four students. President Clark was in Sapporo less than six months, but during that period he marvellously shaped the characters of his pupils. Mr. Rowland says: "The model barn he built is of wood and will decay, but the characters he helped to form are a part of the enduring treasures of Japan. The thirteen of the first class all received baptism, and nearly all of the second class became Christians."

"Into All the World"

This spiritual movement, so powerfully begun, has been an abiding force in this Government College ever since. "The graduates have gone out into all the earth and their works do follow them. Over a score of them have taken degrees in American and European Universities. They are almost without exception men of high ideals and of noble personal character." Dr. Nitobe is a man well known in the United States for his valuable English books, "The United States and Japan," and his "Bushido, or, The Moral Principles of the Samurai." The present president of the institution, Dr. Sato, is a pillar of the Methodist Church, and often appears on the platform. Of these graduates, Mr. K. Uchimura is perhaps the best known in the United States by his fascinating book, "How I Became a Christian;" and were he to write another on, "How I Continued a Christian," it would tell of hardships and victories for Christ of an unusual order and of rare interest.

Providence in Two Movements

It is a wonderful providence that led these two Christian teachers from America to these two ends of Japan to begin a work, the influences of which have been felt for good every year since in the cause of Christ in Japan.

The students of these schools are filled with the spirit of independence to such a degree that they dislike the use of foreign money in propagating Christianity. Though some of them have lost their deep interest in Christian work, there are others whose names are known all over the land as unwavering believers in Christ.

We now come to the distinctively Christian schools of which there are several of almost international reputation. Since in this little book there is no space for the story of more than one, I select the one that was first permitted to exist outside the open ports, the Doshisha. A brief sketch of the difficulties that were overcome will show what it costs in patience and tact to lay foundations for Christian education in Japan.

In the first place, there is need for men of unwavering faith, who know how to organize and use other men, and who believe themselves to have been called of God to that work. Certain it is that God raised up Neesima, the first Japanese who, at the peril of his life, secretly left Japan in 1864 that he might go to some Christian country and learn about the Maker of heaven and earth. In the providence of God, he landed in Boston and was educated by the Hon. Alpheus Hardy, a Christian merchant. He studied in Amherst and Andover, and after nine years, when Prince Iwakura and his embassy went around the world, young Neesima was asked to join the distinguished party in going through Europe. In this way, he became intimate with the most eminent Japanese statesmen of his day, and they liked him in spite of their aversion to his new religion, and tried hard to get him to enter the Government service, where he might have had a high position. But his heart was set on having a Christian college in his native land, and no offer of rank, and no bitter opposition could turn him from his purpose.

Here then was the man that God provided. Initial Difficulty When he reached Japan with $5,000 with which to begin the school, the official classes almost to a man opposed his plan, and the Buddhists were fiercely set against him. His foreign money to them meant foreign control, that is, the property and direction of the school would be in the hands of the missionaries, and to this no governor in Japan would consent. Neesima could establish his school outside of foreign ports only on condition that the whole property was legally his, and no missionary could teach in such a school except as an employee of Mr. Neesima at a fixed salary paid by him. The school must belong wholly to Japanese and no foreigner could own a foot of the soil or a tile on the roofs of the buildings. Even the missionary dwellings, though built entirely with foreign money, were under the same restrictions. Not a door nor a window of them could be owned by a foreigner. This created a tremendous difficulty. Not only large property contributed by the Christians of the United States, but the missionaries also were to be under the supervision of the Japanese, who themselves received all their money through these missionaries. Some thought that the American Board would not sanction such a passing over of control to Japanese; for, should Neesima die, there was no legal process by which the property could be held to its original purpose. It would belong to Neesima's heir. But the American Board happened to have the Rev. J. D. Davis on the ground. He, like Neesima, had a firm belief in God's purpose to establish this school. His war record fitted him to overcome difficulties. He entered the Civil War as a private, rapidly rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, marched through Georgia with Sherman and, in spite of all kinds of perils and severe wounds, insisted on living. After the war he gave himself to Japan. Officials could not prevent his preaching the Gospel, and no Buddhist howls, or threats of assassination daunted him. He

Two Men of

trusted God, he trusted Neesima, and they twain were of one purpose, which is the meaning of the word Doshisha.

Prayerful Opening The school was opened in Kyoto in rented buildings, November 29, 1875. There were eight pupils and two teachers, Neesima and Davis. Dr. Davis wrote thus: "We began our school this morning with a prayer-meeting in which all the scholars took part. I shall never forget Mr. Neesima's tender, tearful, earnest prayer as we began school."

A Mountain Removed There is a beautiful mountain, 2,700 feet high, called Hieizan, just east of Kyoto. When Neesima's school was started, a Buddhist priest of the city is said to have facetiously remarked: "Might as well try to remove Hieizan into Lake Biwa as to start a Jesus school in this city." Hieizan still stands, but those other mountains of difficulty that seemed so impossible to remove have largely disappeared. Those who wish to read more about Neesima will find an excellent chapter in Gordon's "Thirty Eventful Years in Japan," and in the biographies of Neesima by Prof. A. S. Hardy and Dr. J. D. Davis.

Another Problem Solved Friends in the United States contributed most generously for the construction of buildings of brick and stone, and many prominent Japanese, including some of the nobility, gave thousands of dollars in token of their admiration of Neesima. But after Neesima's death, when the desire for absolute independence from all foreign connections became paramount in the minds of the Japanese, the missionaries awoke one morning to find that the Bible had been taken out of the collegiate department, and that even the unchangeable constitution of the school had been altered without consulting the American donors. Probably nothing the native Christians have ever done has caused such a shock to the whole missionary body of Japan. It was widely felt that the Japanese Christians were both ungrateful and untrustworthy. Ultimately the Japanese who were in possession resigned and turned over the control to others who reestablished in the institution those principles for which Dr. Neesima and the American donors made great sacrifices. The disputes have been finally settled, and all parties concerned are in thoroughly friendly relations. The troubles were occasioned by the over-sensitive feelings of the Japanese and their interpretation of their rights under the trust usages of Japan.

A chapter might well be given to the dozen other large boys' schools, and what their graduates have done for Japan, intellectually, morally, and spiritually. Dr. Greene says: "The number of Christian schools, using the

Thousands in Christian
Schools

term in a broad sense, cannot be much less than 250, nor the attendance less than 22,000."

Extent of Woman's Work

It is the glory of modern missions that the Christian women of the West are anxious that to their Eastern sisters should be preached the same helpful Gospel that has blessed them. The unmarried women missionaries are nearly one third of the missionary force. And one immediate result is schools for girls. Wherever these consecrated women go, these schools spring up.

First Woman Missionary

The first woman missionary on Japanese soil was Miss Mary Kidder, now Mrs. E. R. Miller, of the Dutch Reformed Church, who arrived in 1869. The stories of her experiences in the days when the sight of an American woman produced as much excitement as Van Amburgh's circus, together with the magnificent treatment given to her by the high-class Japanese, are intensely interesting. She began a school with two girls. Soon another girl came of whom her father said: "She's a fool and will learn nothing." It turned out that the father was the fool, since he spent his earnings in drinking sake, while the girl became a teacher. The pupils rapidly increased, and the Governor of Yokohama became so interested in this wholly novel experiment that he provided Miss Kidder with a schoolhouse and presented her with a closed carriage, saying: "The distance is too great for you to walk."

But no missionary is satisfied with a day-school. Nothing short of a boarding-school will give the idea of a Christian home with its blessed privileges; but it was not until 1875 that the Ferris Seminary, on the bluff overlooking the new city below, with its beautiful harbour, was dedicated to Christ and opened for the daughters of Japan.

school Begun

The effects of Christian education on the girls are seen in the new ideal of home of which hosts of encouraging examples could be given. Here is one of which Miss Kidder tells: One of her girls from a poor Samurai family was asked by her father to become the wife of a high official who had once seen her at the school. Her father thought that she would eagerly agree, but she was silent. When pressed for a reply, she begged to be excused as she would have to give up her Christian faith. The family urged her to accept the proposal, since the marriage would better the condition of the whole family, and she could secretly be a Christian as before. Now it is one of the hardest things in the world for a Japanese daughter to thwart her father's wishes, but this girl did it. It is utterly impossible for the thousands of girls who have felt the influence of these Christian teachers not to have a vastly higher ideal of the home than they had before. It may not be wholly due to these schools, but the Western family idea has so impressed even the law-makers that the word concubine does not once appear in the new Family Law.

Education

Girls' Schools Widely Scattered

Schools for girls were a surprise to the people here, but these are now found in all the great cities and interior towns. One of these schools has had over a thousand pupils on its rolls. To be sure, "Many girls remain but a short time, not long enough to learn much of Christian truth, or to have their characters largely moulded by their school life. Yet even these girls often gain more than we realize. There are vast results which we can never see."

Government
Education
for Women

The influence of these schools on the Government girls' schools is a point that deserves permanent record. I heard a high official say not long since, at the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the Baptist Girls' School in Sendai: "You missionary ladies have done a vastly greater work for Japan than you ever dreamed of. Our Government had no hope of success in establishing girls' schools until we were inspired by your successes. You have been to us as timely reenforcements to a discouraged army, and without your example there would now be no growing system of higher female education." The demand for these girls' schools is now so great that the Government cannot fully meet it. There are now over 100 higher girls' schools with about 35,000 pupils.

It will thus be seen that the fifty-two Christian girls' schools with some 6,000 pupils, even though these schools were all of high grade and capable of doubling their capacity, would be none too many. This work is as valuable as anything that the Christians of the West can do for this receptive nation. There is a great university for girls in Tokyo, where over a thousand pupils from all parts of the Empire are studying. President Naruse never would have thought of building that university but for the Christian faith in which he was educated.

III.—Medical Work.

Medical work is by common consent the most helpful and successful method of showing the Christian spirit of love. You can get at a man's heart often by curing him of the disease of his body. Dr. Hepburn was the first in Japan to do this, and his fame as a physician did much to break down opposition and prejudice. Dr. J. C. Berry also demonstrated that the physician could go where the minister could not, and, by means of his touring, openings were made in several towns where churches soon sprang up. He won the confidence of officials who permitted him to inspect the sanitary condition of prisons. His suggestions with regard to the health of the prisoners, and their more humane treatment were widely circulated among prison authorities for their instruction. Later on, in 1887, he opened a training school for nurses and a hospital in connection with the Doshisha in Kyoto and did splendid work in these and other directions.

Still Needed as Philanthropy

Other medical men too have done good and abiding work, but as Dr. Taylor aptly says: "In view of the evolutions which have taken place in this country since the commencement of missionary work, the conclusion must be arrived at that medical missionary work, as an auxiliary of general missionary effort, no longer occupies the important position it once did, but has gradually assumed the position that benevolent and charitable work does in Europe and America." The Government hospitals in every province, the numerous institutions for healing carried on by Japanese who have graduated from medical schools in Japan and in the West, and the growing number of physicians and surgeons, make foreign medical work somewhat superfluous, except as benevolent work for the aid and comfort of the poor.

When we see the rapidity with which medical work has advanced, as seen especially in the war with Russia, where Japanese surgeons and physicians reversed the experiences of all previous wars in the proportion of deaths from sickness and those from wounds, it is plain that mere medical work of missionaries is no longer needed as it is in China and Korea. It is, therefore, not surprising to learn that the number of missionary hospitals and dispensaries is diminishing, so that now Protestants have only eight, and the Catholics only thirteen. Among these none surpass in the high ability of its native and foreign staff, and in the attention it attracts, St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo (Episcopal), the head of which is Dr. Teusler. It is one of the great connecting-links between the Japanese and foreigners. It is even gaining an international character.

Of late years several missionaries have turned their works of kindness toward the leper class, of which unfortunates there are many tens of thousands. Since the healing of the vast majority of these people is impossible, the main purpose of the missionary is to ameliorate their condition and to give them the comforts of faith in Christ. Simply the sight of foreigners devoting themselves to this form of lowly and hopeless work is, to the Japanese, a revelation of the amazing power of the love of Christ as manifested in his followers,

Plans of Miss Riddell

Miss Riddell, an English lady of exceptional personality, has thrown herself into this form of Christian work in a manner that has attracted the sympathetic attention even of the Emperor, who has graciously recognized her services by conferring on her "The Blue Ribbon." Her plan is to bring into one large park, fitted to give the best physical, social, and religious comfort, all the afflicted men; and in another distant place of natural beauty all the leprous women. All possible liberty is to be granted, only there are to be no more marriages of any of these people, and thus in one generation it is hoped that this dreadful disease may be eradicated from the nation.

Dr. Whitney's Fruitful Work

Thus among the well-to-do, and among the poorest and most hopeless, medical missions are showing forth the spirit of Him who "went about doing good." Dr. W. N. Whitney, who had medical training, was first appointed an interpreter of the United States Legation in Tokyo. He established a hospital for the poor and later became an independent missionary, and during twenty years many thousands of patients have come under Christian influences, and scores have been converted.

Christian Efforts of Native
Physicians

Dr. Takata of Tokyo and many other Japanese Christian physicians have also been infected with this spirit of loving sacrifice, and strive earnestly, in their own hospitals, to bring patients to a knowledge of Christ.

IV.—Philanthropy.

ONE can only marvel at the great change that has recently come over all Japan in its care for orphans, for the poor, the sick, the depraved and fallen. Fifty years ago, if a famine occurred in one province, the starving ones would receive no help from other provinces. Even Buddhists, with their beautiful teaching of the duty of mercy would offer no help. But when, in 1902, the rice crop largely failed in three northern provinces, and 150,000 people were brought into extreme poverty, thousands being forced to live entirely on such leaves and roots as the forests afforded, Bishop Berlioz, a Catholic missionary, published an account of the sufferings and peril of these people, and at once foreigners contributed about 25,000 yen. Then Japanese in distant parts of the Empire began to give. The Emperor's contribution was 22,000 yen, and two millionaires each gave 10,000 yen. Newspapers here and there opened their columns for reports of contributions.

Meeting the Famine of 1905

But the famine of 1905 in the same region was far more severe, bringing 600,000 people out of a population of 2,000,000, to the verge of starvation. Yet no government ever handled a famine in such a scientific and successful manner. For there was no increase of beggars, no marked increase of deaths, no following pestilence, no increase of crime, no instance of graft, and no large breaking up of families and society. Relief works were started and substantial food was even cheaper all through the famine region than at normal times. Missionaries at once appealed on humanitarian lines for subscriptions, and gifts came from all quarters of the globe, totalling about $500,000, the larger part of which was from America. One of the conspicuous results of these contributions is a Home for Destitute Children in Sendai, in which over 200 are being cared for.

Japanese
Response to American
Need and Aid

So grateful was Japan for this generous expression of international sympathy, that when earthquake and fire destroyed San Francisco, the Emperor and Empress headed a subscription with $100,000 and about $100,000 more were raised by others for the stricken city, in which even the famine region joined with $2,500. The Emperor also conferred a decoration of "The Rising Sun" on Mr. Klopsch, who by his paper, the Christian Herald, made possible these large gifts. Thus out of these calamities ties came one of the many bonds that bind our great Republic and our great neighbour across the Pacific into a common brotherhood, which we sincerely hope and pray may never be broken.

One paragraph from Dr. J. H. Pettee's valuable reports will give a vivid idea of what Christians are doing along benevolent lines: "They have fifteen orphanages, eleven homes for discharged prisoners, one blind asylum, five leper hospitals, two homes for the aged, five schools for the Ainu, five free kindergartens, ten industrial schools, ten other schools for the poor, fourteen hospitals, and boarding-houses for students are increasing in every great educational center. Or, in other words, the 200,000 Christians of Japan have in hand about one half of all the regularly organized benevolent institutions of the land."

Of these institutions, the best known is the Okayama Orphanage, opened by Mr. J. Ishii in 1887. Inspired by the example of George Mueller, who had visited Japan the preceding year, he began his work by adopting one boy. A few months later he formally opened his asylum, renting for that purpose a commodious Buddhist temple. The institution was caring for 373 children, when the famine in the North just deluged it with 823 more boys and girls, but after two years some of these were sent back to their homes. Since the founding of this institution several hundred children have been graduated up into society where they are not only earning their own living and are enthusiastic contributors to their mother Asylum, but are also Christian workers in their various places.

Hold on the People

The position to which the orphanage has attained in the respect of the people at large is seen by its list of 10,265 sustaining members, nearly all Japanese, who each contribute one yen a year. The largest gift from a Japanese subject is 1,854 yen. Why he made it this odd figure I cannot tell, unless it was because of his desire to commemorate the date of Commodore Perry's treaty with Japan. The largest gift ($5,000) came from an American. Perhaps the best proof that this work stands unique among the benevolent institutions under Christian supervision was the conferring on Mr. Ishii of "The Blue Ribbon" by the Emperor, who also graciously recognized the valuable work of the Asylum by conferring an Imperial grant of 1,000 yen annually for ten years. In this public manner, His Majesty recognized his fifteen years of self-sacrificing service in behalf of homeless children. Another reason why this orphanage is so favourably known all over the land is that the little fellows have a stereopticon, with views of themselves at work, at play, at worship, in school, and asleep four to a bed. They have also a musical band which gives concerts and lantern lectures far and wide.

In Tokyo is the well-known Home for Discharged Prisoners, founded by Mr. T. Hara. Everybody knows how exceedingly difficult it is to reform discharged prisoners and turn them into useful members of the community. For twelve years, Mr. Hara has been at work, and out of over 700 dealt with many have become Christians.

Home for Discharged Prisoners

Here is an interesting story of one of the inmates. A man was arrested for burglary in a Christian school. One of the girls, whose room he entered and whose clothing he stole, not losing her presence of mind, gently asked him to take her New Testament also. He was permitted to keep the book in prison, and the result of his study was that he became a devoted Christian. On his discharge, he went to Mr. Hara's Home, and recommenced life as a carpenter. More than that, he led his former accomplice also to become a Christian. In this connection it should be recorded that a large amount of Christian literature is permitted in some of the prisons. I know of one in which the prisoners were permitted to buy from their slim earnings over 300 yen worth of Christian books in one year.

The reformatory work of Mr. K. Tomeoka should next be considered. He prepared himself for his work by carefully studying the methods adopted by similar institutions in New England and New York. On his return to Japan, his thorough knowledge of this perplexing problem attracted the attention of the Government, and he was appointed to be the teacher of morals in the Sugamo Prison in Tokyo, which is Japan's model prison. The Buddhists, however, made a great outcry over the employment of a Christian chaplain, and the Government removed Mr. Tomeoka, but gave him an even better position, that of Instructor in the School for Training Prison Officials. He held this position many years; but his heart goes out toward the children who are in danger of becoming criminals, so that he opened a reformatory which he calls "The Family School." And this work has inspired others, so that now there are twelve child-saving schools. One gift of 18,000 yen shows how Japanese philanthropists are interested in work for unfortunates. That the Emperor and his advisers place such high value on these forms of Christian work is one of the signs of the times. In one year there were four Imperial gifts to Christian institutions: To the Young Men's Christian Association, the Okayama Orphan Asylum, Hara's Home for Discharged Convicts, and Tomeoka's Family School.

These are but examples of what the Japanese Christians are doing. Who can estimate the wide influence for good these works of love are exerting on all classes of society? Already Buddhists are imitating the Christians in every form of philanthropic work, and Baron Mitsui has given 100,000 yen for a charity hospital in Tokyo.

V.—Literary Work.

Thirty years ago, there was not a newspaper or magazine in all the Empire; now there are about a thousand publications and it would be hard to find a people more eager to read than the Japanese. Just as soon as evangelists go here and there preaching the Word and churches begin to be formed, there comes a great demand for tracts. The first tract was published secretly from wooden blocks, in 1864, with Dr. Hepburn's aid, and had the Japanese printer been discovered cutting out these "Christian" blocks, he would have been promptly beheaded. Ten years later, Dr. Davis had immense difficulty in getting his brief tract, "The Short Way," put into colloquial and cut onto blocks. Of that leaflet 100,000 copies were distributed in ten years.

Thirty Year
Contrast

As soon as the Japanese began to use the printing-press, the number of tracts rapidly increased, and now the list of these contains over 400 titles, with an annual circulation averaging about 500,000 copies. During the Forward Movement, which celebrated the incoming century, 37,602 copies of one tract were distributed, amounting to 2,306,528 pages. And one native house sold, in 1902, 21,832 copies of tracts and books, or 1,468,326 pages of Christian literature, while in 1905 the Japanese Book and Tract Society alone sent out 723,620 tracts, so that the total output must have been far more than a million of tracts.

Early Christian Books Something more substantial than tracts has been found necessary, and books began to be issued. Some of the first of these were translations from Chinese books, and thus the missionaries of China greatly aided the work in Japan. I remember one book that had an immense sale all through Japan, Dr. W. A. P. Martin's "Evidences of the Heavenly Way." The Chinese virtually rejected the book, but the Japanese warmly welcomed it, and it was the means of bringing thousands into sympathy with Western civilization and the Christian principles which are its foundation.

Commentaries Invaluable Commentaries also are a necessity. Many a Japanese has stumbled over the first chapter of Matthew with its genealogical table, and over the strange names of persons and places. Moreover, after one has become a Christian, he cannot study his Bible without helps, nor can the evangelist teach and preach without books of reference. Dr. D. W. Learned has done by far the largest part in this form of work, and his fifteen volumes of commentaries on the New Testament are invaluable aids.

Apologetics, Theology, Lives of Christ and of Paul, and translations of the lives of eminent Christians are becoming numerous. Books on Livingstone, General Gordon, and others are having a great sale outside the Christian body, and are quietly influencing many to study "The Book" that helped to make these men great. Adjutant Yamamura, of the Salvation Army, published "The Common People's Gospel," and in two and a half years 10,000 copies were sold.

Among periodicals, one of the oldest and most popular is The Good Tidings, which, for over twenty years, has been edited by Mrs. E. R. Miller, the founder of Ferris Seminary. It is very hard to make a Christian paper pay, since the Christian constituency is so limited. But the Revs. M. Uemura, and H. Kozaki, and Mr. K. Uchimura, and others have done it, and done it well. Of course, almost every mission has its own paper mainly supported with mission money, but the widely influential papers and magazines are those of the independent Churches, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the Salvation Army. A valuable Christian literature has been produced by earnest and gifted Japanese, and their books are selling even more largely than those written by missionaries. Moreover, some of the ablest writers in the secular press are Christians, and I have seen an occasional editorial in a daily paper that would not be out of place if uttered from an English or American pulpit. Not infrequently do these sincere words reach some hungry soul, who is thereby led to inquire into Christianity, and, perhaps, to yield himself to Christ. I know of one who saw an editorial on "The Use of Money," not for self but for others. The reader was a dissolute young man of a wealthy house, who spent his money in riotous living. Because of this article he became an inquirer with the result that he soon quit his evil ways, joined the Church, opened a preaching place in his village, induced his Buddhist parents to welcome Christian workers, and for eight years he has been valiantly "keeping the faith."

Christian

Authors

The names of Uchimura, Kozaki, Uemura, Miyagawa, Matsumura, Ebuka, Ebina, Tomeoka, Harada, Motoda, are not only those of able preachers, but also of men whose books speak to far wider audiences than their sermons. There are Christian professors in the various schools and even in the Imperial University whose writings are very helpful. Christian members of the Diet, too, have published some influential books; and, at last, Christian novels are beginning to have real success, edition after edition being quickly sold.

Besides these five comprehensive forms of labour, the following auxiliary forms deserve especial mention; for they are all formed on world lines to do world work. They are the Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, the Young People's Societies, the Temperance Movement, the Bible Society, the Scripture Union, the Salvation Army, the Sunday School Association of Japan, and the Japan Peace Society.

Diversities of Operations

Timely Contributions

Young Men's Christian Association.

The first Young Men's Christian Association hall was erected in Osaka in 1881. The missionaries of the various denominations in Japan felt the need of a place in Tokyo in which mass meetings could be held, and where interdenominational work could be done. As it was useless to ask the different home boards to unite in this work, it was agreed to ask the Young Men's Christian Association of the United States and Great Britain to contribute each $1,500 for the purpose. Sir George Williams of London immediately sent $1,500 as his own contribution, and Mr. E. Monroe, President of the New York Young Men's Christian Association, who happened to be passing through Osaka at that time, left a check for $1,200. Australian friends sent several hundreds of dollars, and thus a brick hall of 1,200 sittings was built near the centre of the city. Mr. J. T. Swift, the first secretary for Japan, at once placed the work among the important agencies for Christianizing the land. He secured a gift of $50,000 from one person, and in 1894 erected a commodious brick building for class and committee work, while, as a provision against earthquakes, the audience hall is contiguous to the main building.

Prominence of Building,
Meetings, and Speakers

If any one who knows Tokyo is asked what is the most conspicuous Christian edifice in the city, there will be but one answer. It is not the Russian Cathedral that overlooks the city from Surugadai, nor any of the 125 places of worship, but it is the Young Men's Christian Association. The late beloved American minister, Col. A. E. Buck, once said: "There is perhaps no other building in Tokyo that stands more prominently before the general public as an index of organized Christianity than that of the Young Men's Christian Association," and Dr. Greene declares: "The Saturday and Sunday meetings are probably the most notable gatherings in the city." From this building issue streams of Christian influence that are felt for good not only in the capital, but in the most distant provinces. In the hall are heard lectures not only from prominent Christians, but from statesmen, business men, members of the nobility, and distinguished visitors from foreign lands. It was the organized Associations that made possible the telling work of Mr. John R. Mott in 1901, by which a thousand inquirers were gained during his brief visit.

Nothing shows more plainly the firm hold this centre of Christian work has on the public than the fact that the late Hon. K. Kataoka, President of the House of Representatives, was also President of the Young Men's Christian Association, and among the fourteen directors are professors, lawyers, physicians, and other men of large position and reputation. At their tenth anniversary, May 8, 1903, Count Okuma, ex-Premier, said: "I am happy to express the hope that young men will more and more take advantage of the opportunities for religious, social, intellectual, and physical improvement which your Association affords." Baron Maejima has given his testimony also. "I firmly believe," he said, "we must have religion as the basis of our national and personal welfare. No matter how large an army or navy we may have, unless we have righteousness at the foundation of our national existence we shall fall short of the highest success. I do not hesitate to say that we must rely upon religion for our highest welfare. And when I look about me to see what religion we may best rely upon, I am convinced that the religion of Christ is the one most full of strength and promise for the nation and the individual. I congratulate your Association upon the good work it is doing." Baron Shibusawa has recently visited America, and though he is one of the leading financiers of Japan, he saw something more than money. He said: "I was much surprised and impressed by what I saw of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association in America, not only as a religious but as a social factor in the community. I earnestly hope that the Associations in Japan will make such progress as will enable them to meet the great needs of our young men."

Bible
Conferences

Summer schools, winter schools, and spring schools have sprung up in different educational centres. For a week or ten days, students gather for Bible study and for stimulating lectures on religious subjects. Sometimes as many as two hundred thus take brief courses in the Life of Christ, and go back to win their comrades to faith in their Lord.

Christian
Teachers'
Agency

A unique phase of work which is having great success is that of providing English teachers for middle and high schools. In 1890-91, twelve American college graduates were thus called to Japan, several of whom taught many years or became missionaries. Recently twenty more have been employed, two of whom have gone home to prepare for missionary work. These men not only make excellent teachers, but also by Bible classes in their homes, and by their truly moral lives, have influenced many to become Christians, and have been the means of the formation of three new associations in the interior.

No piece of Christian work in the East has prospered more than the Young Men's Christian Association. It is a splendid specimen of "naturalized Christianity." That is, it is a Japanese institution, with president, five vice-presidents, treasurer, seven army secretaries, all Japanese; while, of the four national and ten local secretaries, nine are Japanese. Because it is a Japanese institution, undenominational, representing world Christianity better than any other Christian institution, therefore the Japanese Government not only permitted its work in the army during the Russian war, but aided it in being conspicuously successful. It has attracted the sympathetic attention of the Government, as is seen from His Majesty's generous gift of $5,000. And Japanese men of wealth have joined with some generous givers in America, and have erected fine permanent buildings in Kyoto, Nagasaki, and a large Chinese extension to the Tokyo building, besides a score of hostels in the educational centers.

It is to the lasting glory of the Young Men's Christian Association that it is the first institution of any kind to hold a World's Conference in the East. The success of this World's Student Conference in Tokyo, April 3-7, 1907, and of the enthusiastic after-meetings in all the great cities North and South, makes the most memorable chapter in the history of this organization. Over 56,000 attended these special meetings, and 1,700 inquirers became candidates for baptism. Its rapidly increasing influence is seen in its mission to India by President Harada and Dr. Motoda, who lectured in English to educated Indians in many cities on the relation of Christianity to Japan's new life and conquering power. And to this must be added the significant facts that when the new Young Men's Christian Association building was begun in Seoul, Korea, November 14, 1907, Prince Ito, who presented 10,000 yen toward the expenses of the World's Convention, together with the Korean Crown Prince, were the distinguished guests who laid the corner-stone. Also, among the 13,000 Chinese students studying in Tokyo, a flourishing Young Men's Christian Association was formed January 11, 1907, an event that attracted the written congratulations of many statesmen of Japan and many Christian leaders of several countries. Out of this movement has sprung up a church of 50 members headed by an able Chinese pastor. And among Koreans in Tokyo, 167 Christians are related to Young Men's Christian Association work.

At the close of 1908, there were sixty-seven Associations; fifty of them in colleges, ranging from the Imperial universities to the middle schools; and seventeen in towns and cities; while the total membership was 4,200.

In a recent address on the Young Men's Christian Association as the best piece of Christian work in the East, a young man interrupted me with the question: "If it is more successful than other forms of Christian work, wouldn't it be wise economy to withdraw all other kinds of work and entrust the Christianization of Japan to the Young Men's Christian Association alone?"

Any Young Men's Christian Association man out there would reply like this: "Our work started from the Churches, our workers are all from the Churches, and we could not exist without them at our back. We are a specialized body of workers to fit special conditions of our time." So it is of this and all the other forms of world work which follow. They are all children of the Churches of Christ. They could not live but for the Churches behind them, whose prayers and faith and goods make more possible Christ's beneficent twentieth century world work.

Young Women's Christian Association.

This is comparatively a new form of effort in Japan, but it stepped into prominence at the World's Student Convention, where eleven out of twelve Associations were represented by 60 delegates, while others from six Western countries, besides four from China and one from India, fully showed the world purpose of this organization. An unlimited field among the higher girls' schools is opening to this form of Christian work.

First Christian Endeavor Society

Young People's Societies.

In the summer of 1886, when most of the American Board missionaries were spending the hot months on the templed hills of Hieizan, one of the mothers said to Dr. Davis, the acting pastor of the camp, "Can't you have some kind of class for the children as a stepping-stone to Church membership? My older children are nine and seven, and while they are Christians I wish they could have some preparation for entering the Church." Dr. Davis replied that he had recently been reading of a Society of Christian Endeavor, and perhaps something of that kind would be a good thing for the missionary children. So he drew up a simple pledge somewhat similar to that of Junior Christian Endeavorers', and thus was formed the first Christian Endeavor Society in Japan, composed entirely of the children of the American Board Mission. Some of these Endeavorers are now missionaries and others are volunteers.

The first real impetus given to the movement was occasioned by Dr. F. E. Clark's visit in 1892. In a year the number of societies increased to fifty-seven, but they decreased to less than half that number during the reaction that weakened so many churches. In at least one case, however, the Endeavorers saved a church which otherwise would have collapsed. Dr. Clark's second visit was on the rising tide, just when the Christians were planning to usher in the new century with an earnest advance in all forms of work. The eighth Annual Convention was held in Kobe at that time, and the idea that this society represented a world movement first dawned upon the assembly. Thereupon they elected their president, Rev. T. Harada, a delegate to the World's Christian Endeavor Convention in London. Since then the Christian Endeavor Society has become a prominent factor in the churches, ten denominations being represented. At the Fifteenth Annual Meeting held in Tokyo, there were some 200 delegates representing all sections of Japan and all denominations. They came also from China, Siam, India, and Hawaii. They count 156 societies with a membership of 3,542, a gain of 477 during the year. The Society is weak financially, but a strong effort is being made toward self-support.

Attempting Great Things

The work is most prosperous in Tokyo, where there are twenty societies. It is planned to push this organization all through the land, and for this purpose Japan is divided into twelve sections, each with a secretary. Six hundred copies of The Endeavor (monthly) are published, but one vigorous little Society in the North has its own jelly-pad Endeavor, containing twenty-four pages of illustrated, up-to-date articles.

Growth of Epworth League

Although the Christian Endeavor Societies in Japan far outnumber the young people's organizations belonging to distinctive denominations, yet mention should be made of the Baptist Young People's Union and the Epworth League. The first chapter of the Epworth League in Japan was organized at Nagasaki in 1891, and within two years had a membership of eighty young people. They unitedly entered upon aggressive Christian service, the young women conducting eleven mission Sunday-schools which had an average attendance of 600 children, and the young men preaching at two and sometimes three mission churches. In three years' time, there were four chapters of the Epworth League in Japan, and in 1896 the number had increased to eleven. In 1900 a central office was established in Tokyo, and an existing publication was made the official League paper. At the meeting of the Japan Methodist Conference in 1902, a resolution was adopted expressing a desire that the Epworth League and the Christian Endeavor Society might be united in closer sympathy and practical cooperation, which at last has been accomplished.

The Temperance Movement.

From the first the Christians set themselves against the ruinous sake drinking customs of the people. Society in those days was so constructed that men had to drink whether they liked it or not, and wives had to serve the cup at feasts. To refuse to drink was regarded as an insult that sometimes cost a man dearly. We may frankly acknowledge that a drunken Japanese is seldom seen on the streets, except in the very lowest quarters, but, nevertheless, sake drinking, done mainly at night, is a fruitful source of poverty, crime, and immorality. The temperance reformers are having remarkable successes in educating public opinion upon this subject. I attended a feast given by teachers in honour of the present Minister of Education, Baron Kikuchi who when the sake began to flow arose and said, that, as he did not drink sake, he would at once proceed to deliver his address. That brave remark aided many teachers that night to say, "No."

The National Temperance League of Japan

has already accomplished a most praiseworthy work—worthy of the term national. There are 90 branches with a membership of about 7,000. The Hon. T. Ando, formerly consul in Hawaii, is its earnest president, and he gives himself and his fortune to what he calls “the holy cause of gospel temperance.” Nemoto Sho, one of the noted members of the Diet, several years ago successfully fought through the Diet a law prohibiting the use of tobacco to minors; and though defeated year after year in his attempts to secure a like law about sake, last year succeeded. This law is carried out with marked strictness among the hundreds of military cadets. The movement is a wide moral help to families and schools, and is especially fruitful of good in the churches. Dr. Soper among missionaries must have the praise of leading in this movement.

The Bible Society.

Public Sentiment Becoming Friendly

This Society is the outcome of the union in 1890 of the National Bible Society of Scotland (1875), the American Bible Society (1876), and the British and Foreign Bible Society (1881). It sells its books at the cost of publication, so that a Gospel can be bought for half a cent, and a New Testament for five cents and upward. In the early days, Japanese bookstores would have nothing to do with the books of the

"Jesus Way," and sales had to be effected through missionaries, churches, and colporteurs. In 1882, a Bible store was opened in Nagasaki, but the keeper was mobbed and his goods were thrown into the street; but new stores, in all the large cities where there is a demand, gladly keep Bibles on sale. During 1907, the sales and gifts of Bibles, Testaments, and portions of the Bible far surpassed any previous record. The total circulation of the three societies was 12,700 Bibles, 96,136 Testaments, and 184,895 portions, while the receipts were 26,910 yen.

Large Bible Circulation

During the Japanese-Chinese war (1895), the agent of the American Bible Society had astonishing success in distributing thousands of Gospels among the soldiers, and was officially thanked by the Chief of Staff of the Imperial Guard. But far more amazing was the freedom with which hundreds of thousands of portions of the Bible and tracts were distributed in the army and navy during the war with Russia (1905). To be sure, they were not all read, but so many blessed incidents about the Gospel booklets came from the battle-fields of Manchuria and from the returned soldiers, that we know the harvest was very great.

Its magazine, in which the daily readings are simply and attractively explained, is to the 9,000 members of the Union a great help, many of whom live in the country apart from church privileges. Dr. Whitney, of whose hospital work mention has already been made, is also the promoter of this good work.

Special
Literature

At the coming of the Army in 1895, some did not think that the methods of the Salvation Army would be successful in Japan, but its officers were men and women of ability and tact, who at once adapted themselves to local conditions. They won some able Japanese as co-workers, and have already developed a work that is greatly blessing the classes they especially aim to reach. In their successful efforts to rescue girls who have been sold into slavery of the worst sort, some of the officers have been roughly handled and even wounded, but the agitation created has resulted in an important change in the laws of Japan so that now these girls can at any time abandon their wretched lives. The War Cry of the Army is a marked success, having a circulation of 11,000 copies twice a month; and of "The Common People's Gospel" 10,000 copies were sold in two years and a half. During 1902, 15,000 books and tracts were published, and 1,272 people were converted, but less than half that number joined themselves to any church. The Army's exceptional attainment in self-support is worthy of praise. In 1906 they raised over 12,000 yen. The number of social institutions has increased from two to ten, and they now have 29 Army corps.

The great event worthy of permanent record was the visit of the venerable General Booth. It was a veritable triumph. If you want to read how city after city welcomed him; how the Emperor honored him; how the largest theatres could not hold the audiences; and how the daily papers wrote whole columns about him and his gospel, read The Christian Movement in Japan, 1907. By the way, this book is a mine of rich stores with reference to all of these nine world forms of Christian work.

The Sunday School Association of Japan.

Probably no Christian work has at once jumped into full organization with such rapidity as this. Mr. Frank L. Brown, of Brooklyn, New York, in his visit to Japan in 1906, wisely took into account the independent spirit of the Japanese Christians, so that this work started as a native association. Its first General Convention was held in Tokyo, May, 1907, with Judge Watanabe of the Supreme Court as president, and with delegates from various parts of the Empire. The Japan Peace Society.

A Result of the Christian
Spirit

While this is not distinctively a Christian society, everybody recognizes it as one manifestation of the heart of the Prince of Peace. It was formed in 1906, on that day so full of meaning to all peace lovers, the day when the Hague Court was first opened, May 18th. While missionaries were active in its formation, it is a Japanese organization with Christian men as its chief officers, and its membership represents all classes. Mr. S. Ebara, M.P., whose eloquent speech in the Diet won the passage of the bill forbidding minors to drink sake, is the president. And among its first publications is Judge Watanabe's "Why I Love Peace."

American
Relations

This society is already closely related to the American Peace Society, 31 Beacon Street, Boston, Massachusetts, from which full particulars can be obtained. In this organization we see one of those manifestations of the Japanese spirit which tend to show that they are not lovers of war.

QUESTIONS FOR STUDY.

AIM.—To estimate the need and results of broad Christian activities in Japan.

1. Give three reasons for the importance of philanthropic work as a department of Christian missions in Japan.
2. In view of the teachings of Japanese religions, why was there so little charitable work fifty years ago?
3. Was there anything in Shinto that would incite to such work?
4. Why did Buddhism bear so little fruit in this line?
5. What was there lacking in its teaching that in Christianity supplies motives for helping others?

PROBLEMS AND CHARACTERISTICS

Of course every great mission field has its own problems and characteristics. For example, suppose each of the great mission fields had about 100,000 native Christians. It would be impossible to say that one field was as successful and promising as another, and that each field should have the same amount of financial aid from Christian lands. For one field might be the result of only a few years' work, as in Korea. One body of Christians might be born in the midst of oppression and persecution, as in Turkey. One work might be among ignorant tribes separated from each other and in deep poverty, as may be the case in India. And one might be among a spirited, independent, open-minded people, as in Japan.

We must study the environment in which missionary work is being carried on in order to know its problems, its successes, its failures, and its prospects. Nowadays vastly more attention is being given, than ever before, to the most interesting study of environment, and we will briefly consider it in Japan.

Each Field
Distinct

Environment to be Studied

Fourfold Aspect of Japan

By environment I mean all that has made the people of Japan a great and powerful nation, and it will answer our purpose if I divide it into the geographical, political, religious, and educational environment.

Geographical Aspect

Geographically, Japan is an island of surpassing beauty, lying right in the path of the world's commerce. The beauty of its scenery and its floral treasures have developed in the whole people a rare esthetic sense, and this love of the beautiful is reflected in their thought and even in their moral life. Then the commerce of the world is powerfully attracted to this empire which is sometimes called "The Door of Asia." This has built up great banking-houses and manufactures and developed chambers of commerce; and thus Japan is now bound into the world's life by the friendly ties of an ever-growing and powerful commerce.

Political Aspect

Politically, Japan has what no other nation has, an Imperial Line running back unbroken into prehistoric ages. What a moral force this has been in the life of the nation! This is perhaps the only long line of rulers in history against which the people have never risen in revolt, and for which the people have the most profound reverence. Colonel Buck, when Minister to Japan, once said to me, "The Emperor is one of the ablest and best of living rulers." The Empress, it is universally said, is one of the noblest of women, devoted to simplicity of life and to good works. "The Imperial Line always sides with the people and against the nobles whenever any difficulty arises between them," said the mayor of Sendai. "The most impressive fact on the battle-fields of Manchuria was seeing the poor fellows dying, yet shouting with their last breath, 'Heika, Banzai,' 'Long live the Emperor!'" ; so said one of the generals to me, and you will find it also in "Human Bullets."

Here then is a nation of 50,000,000 with the most devoted attachment and loyalty to their unique ruling line. And wonderful to tell, this absolute ruler has given to his people virtually all the precious liberties for which our fathers fought and suffered and died. They have not only civil liberty, but what we prize even more, religious liberty. So that thoughtful scholars who have lived in Japan are saying that Japan is much more Occidental than Oriental, that the people are more like Westerners than they are like Asiatics.

A Unique Ruler

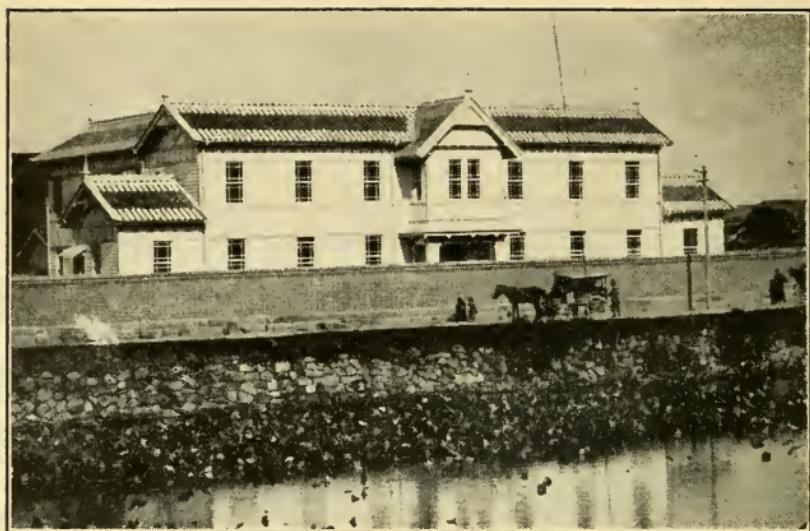

Before leaving the political environment we must not omit the question of extritoriality. Japan is now the only great mission field in which foreigners have no extritorial rights. Missionaries and Japanese are all under the same government and laws. This passing away of extritoriality in Japan in 1900 is one of the great political facts that has had an enormous bearing on the extension of Christianity. It is because Japan handled this question far more skillfully than China or Turkey that Christianity has gained without bloodshed such an important place. Mark this, that missionaries have never been murdered in Japan, while they have been killed by the dozen in China. Native Christians in modern Japan have never been slaughtered as in Turkey. There are strong native churches in Japan of which, for the first time in the history of the Church, it cannot be said, "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church." This alone marks the Christian movement in Japan as unique.

Relation of Foreigners

Religious Aspect

Religiously, there never was a people better prepared for the toleration of Christianity than the Japanese. For Buddhism is essentially a religion of peace. As you ride in a jinrikisha through the country, you will see at the entrance of many a village a tall flag-pole on the base of which is inscribed, "Peace to this village." Confucius also taught that men should live in peace with all the world, since "All who dwell between the Four Seas are brethren." Thus there has been no fanatical and bitter resistance to Christianity on the part of Buddhism, Confucianism, and Shintoism. On the contrary, there have been held great public meetings where religionists of every name, foreign and native, have met as friends and have spoken freely from the same platform.

And we must not forget that it is out of the old religious atmosphere of Japan that the best Christians come. They are telling their experience in a way that teaches us much of God's wonderful preparatory work, and we must find room here for one illustration. Mr. K. Yamamoto, a graduate of the Tokyo Higher Commercial School, and then for ten years in a Japanese Steamship Company, says:

"In my early schooling I was taught Confucian morality, and thus given a conception of universal brotherhood. Although different from and vaguer than the Christian teaching, it prepared me to believe in human brotherhood and divine Fatherhood. I was born in a Buddhist home, and thuse imbibed a faint idea of the immortality of spirits, which tended to belief in eternal life. In such a strong Shinto district, we were all brought up to go on festival days to the shrines to worship the gods and goddesses, to make offerings, and to vow fealty to our rulers. Reverence toward the gods and loyalty to one's sovereign seem to me essential preparations for the higher religious experiences. Thus these three fundamental truths, universal brotherhood, the future life, and loyalty were all in me awaiting the germinating touch of Christianity."

Preparatory

Native
Religions

Three Fundamental Truths

Contrast with Other Lands

Thus we see that the religious environment is far different from what it is in India, where the caste spirit makes the spirit of brotherhood almost impossible; and far different from what it is in Mohammedan lands, where the law allows no Mohammedan to change his religion.

Educational Aspect

There remains the educational environment, in which virtually all the children go to school, where the press is free, and everybody reads the papers and magazines. Christianity loves nothing better in men than open-mindedness and love of truth. For without these virtues it is useless to preach "Repent!" To be sure, in the public schools of the Empire it is not permitted to teach any religion, since that would lead to a squabble on the part of different religionists and sects to capture the schools. But pupils can have their own Young Men's Christian Associations or young people's societies, or Bible classes, outside of school hours, and frequently such movements have the warm sympathy of even non-Christian teachers. One example shows how Christian students do it. A few students not long ago asked for the use of our parlor once a week for their prayer-meeting. To my surprise some twenty came for over a year. Such meetings, while not permitted in public school buildings, can thus be held elsewhere.

Peculiar Problems

Now it is easy to see that in such an environment, where the nation is tied into the world's greatest movements; where a strong and just government gives impartial protection to all religions; where the spirit of caste is done away with; where the old religions, instead of bitterly persecuting the new, are seen to be remarkable preparations for Christianity; and where education and freedom open the minds for new truths, we must expect some unique problems.

The first problem concerns the missionaries. We have seen that the Japanese are a spirited, independent, progressive, self-respecting people, fully capable of making their own plans and carrying out their own undertakings. In all Christian work they early showed organizing ability and rapidly came to the front as independent preachers, teachers, and writers. And what John the Baptist said about himself was long ago impressed on missionaries: "They must increase, but we must decrease." What Paul also said began to find a new meaning to us: "We would not have dominion over your faith, but would be helpers of your joy."

In other words, the Japanese have forged ahead, so that, in the Congregational body (Kumi-ai), all the dependent churches have been passed over to the financial and spiritual care of the Kumi-ai Standing Committee, so that the American Board has now no churches in Japan. As fast as a few Christians are gathered anywhere, not missionaries, but the Japanese Association of pastors forms them into a church and ordains their pastor. This body of Christians now numbers about 15,000 members and 100 churches. They have their own Home and Foreign Missionary Society with a budget of over 10,000 yen, and they are pushing their work in Korea and even in China. Educational, publication, and charitable work, with the exception of educational work in Kobe, is mainly or wholly under the control of Japanese, while the missionaries are their sympathetic and valued helpers.

Native Control in Other Denominalational Groups

In the united Methodist body, for the first time in the great East, a native bishop has been elected—Bishop Honda—and the missionaries gladly recognize his authority over the whole Methodist (native) Church. In the Episcopal churches a native bishop is already in sight, the selection to take place as soon as the Christians raise a fund for his proper support. In the united Presbyterian body, the Japanese with their large number of self-supporting churches, have taken the lead, and in far-off Formosa and China are doing aggressive and successful Christian work. Indeed, all the missions depend for their present and future prospects on educated and gifted Japanese men and women as leaders. Thus in Japan, as in no other country, the open question for the last few years has been: "What is the future of the missionaries?" "Has not the time come for their gradual withdrawal?"

It would be a great mistake to withdraw missionaries from Japan. What is wanted is not withdrawal, but such methods as shall fit the new environment, and shall satisfy the Japanese leaders. If missionary societies recognize these changed conditions, they can be of vast aid in hastening the evangelization of the whole Empire. There are now in all the independent churches Japanese men and women who should be consulted. They are even more eager than we are that the knowledge of Christ should be brought to their brothers and sisters in this generation. They can do what we cannot, and we can do what they cannot. New missionaries are needed, but they should be sent in consultation with responsible leaders, who will welcome them, locate them, and work with them. Generous gifts of money are needed to widen in every direction the work of the native Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, and to raise the Christian colleges to a higher rank, some of them to the rank of universities. Choice Christian literature capable of reaching the minds of scholars as well as of the common people, needs to be multiplied, by translations and original theses, a thousand fold. Christian scholars, pastors of known repute, statesmen, and notable authors have already begun to visit Japan, and have done large things in the way of inspiring powerful evangelistic movements. These brotherly visits should be increased many fold. These then are some of the methods by which the Christians of the West can directly aid the Christian movement of the East. And this aid that fits the environment will not fail to produce, under the blessed leading of the Spirit of God, rapid and unparalleled results. There would then be what Richards, the best-beloved missionary in China, calls, "Conversion by the millions."

Attitude of Christian
Nations

'Another even greater problem is what ministerial gatherings and theological institutions are now discussing under this subject: the attitude of Christian nations toward the East.

Hurtful Agitation in the United States

Nothing so astonished me on my return to the United States, in 1907, as the wide misunderstandings about Japan. I found suspicions of Japan's "swelled head," and of her designs against the Philippines, and numerous sensational papers were persistently saying that war was a foregone conclusion. There was a rude and insulting agitation against Japanese immigration, and the feelings of Japan were uselessly hurt by the unsympathetic manner in which Japanese children were excluded from the schools of San Francisco. This style of talk not only surprised the Japanese nation, it also chilled the Christian work of the Empire.

You can easily see how useless our missionary work out there is so long as a suspicious and unfriendly attitude is conspicuous in the United States. For the Japanese are in fact our true friends. Their friendship for us has grown until it is one of the deep sentiments of the nation. It is unique and is not felt toward any other nation, not even toward her noble ally Great Britain. It is called "a historic friendship." I am thanked wherever I go, for what my country has done for Japan—in the peaceful opening of it; in our sympathetic diplomacy; in our reception of hundreds and thousands of their youths and giving them freely the best advantages of our colleges and universities and even of our homes; in the return of the indemnity; in our sympathy during the Russian war; and in our generous aid during the famine. I know the people of all grades and conditions, and I know we have no better friends than Japan.

Now if we really long to have Japan become a Christian nation, the people of the West must have a Christian attitude toward her—one of peace and good-will. We must especially cultivate in all our Churches and in our periodicals a spirit of trustful brotherhood that cannot be stampeded by any wave of jingo suspicion. There is no more necessary factor in the conversion of the millions of Japan than having our government and the people generously sympathetic and friendly toward them. That makes the best international environment in which we can work as children of the God who is the Father of all men.

Thin Ranks,
but a Christian Leaven

We come next to some of the problems that confront the Christians of Japan. The latest statistics give a native force of over 2,000, with 864 churches, and a total of 153,631 Church-members. These include Protestants, Catholics, and Russian Orthodox believers. But what are these among 50,000,000? It looks like a perilously small force. Yet Christ taught how a little leaven does its invisible work until the whole is changed, and how one seed of truth brings forth a hundred fold.

A Widely Diffused Element

And it is not too much to say that the national life—in the family, in education, in literature, in the laws and government—feels the effect of Christian truth, and there are missionaries and native pastors, who, seeing how far beyond the churches Christian truth has touched the hearts and lives of thousands, say without hesitation, "There are at least a million Christians in Japan." What Count Katsura said when he was Premier (1904), shows how Christianity impressed him as being wide-spread. He said in an interview granted to Dr. Imbrie: "The number of those professing Christianity,

BAPTIST CHURCH, FUKUOKA
PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, KYOTO

I do not know; but it must be a large number, with a much larger number who are Christians in their affiliations. The Japanese Christians are not confined to any one rank or class. They are to be found among the members of the Diet, the judges in the courts, the professors in the universities, the editors of leading secular papers, and the officers of the army and navy. Christian literature has entrance into the military and naval hospitals, and a relatively large number of the trained nurses employed in them are Christians.”¹

Well then, among their problems is the deepening of their spiritual life. “O, how we need Jesus!” said Bishop Honda. How to become more sensitive to sin; how to feel responsible to God; how to prevail in prayer; how to cultivate the Christian customs of Bible reading, public worship, and Sunday observance; this is a problem natural to Christianity everywhere, and we need only say with gratitude that Japanese believers are being guided into precious Christian experiences and into the secrets of Jesus.

Perhaps the greatest pressing problem peculiar to the Christians of Japan comes from their very successes and their consecrated ambition to gather at once into the churches that million of the friends of Christianity. To this end, they are sending far and wide by mail the

Extension*

Bible and Christian literature. And to prevent the pastors and evangelists from getting into ruts, the leaders gather them into conventions and give them their best thoughts and experiences, and send them back inspired by prayer and Bible study.

Evangelistic Campaigns

But their best strength and sacrifices are being made by evangelistic campaigns in strategic places. The necessary money is raised, the cities selected, and the chosen preachers go forth. The place in which a campaign begins is a city where the harvest is promising, yet where the church is still weak and not very influential. One earnest sincere effort of two or three weeks, combining nightly preaching with daily work upon individuals, may result in such a revival as brings scores of people into the church and thus enables it to be henceforth an independent and influential church. I know a judge who spent five consecutive hours with one of these preachers, and then went two hundred miles to be baptized where his legal friends could witness his public entrance into Christianity. I know of one campaign in six places where just forty-seven men and women were added to each church. And sometimes sixty and even more than one hundred have thus been added to single churches, so that during 1906 statistics show a total addition to the Protestant churches of about 7,000.

But while the Christians are strong in aggressive purpose, and rich in faith, and filled with the missionary spirit, any one can see that they are comparatively weak in money for the extension of their work throughout the Empire. They themselves feel this weakness. It is the old money question in a new form. The nineteenth century way of putting it was, "So long as we give the money we shall control the work." It would be sad indeed to carry over into the twentieth century, among such a capable people as the Japanese, this assumption of foreign dominion. The work there has reached the critical period where it is virtually independent. They are no longer "babes." Gifted and consecrated men and women have the work in charge. Under these most favorable circumstances a thousand dollars will do more than ten times that amount under the old plan. The Japanese need the sympathetic financial aid that we of the West can give, and by thus giving in faith and prayer we shall hasten the conversion of millions.

There is one more difficulty before the Japanese Churches in which we of the West are deeply concerned. Out there, we see a great breaking up of old religious traditions, and new knowledge concerning every department of life is flooding the land. The Western spirit of materialism has more than touched Japan, and nothing would give so powerful a spiritual uplift to Japan as a more rapid healing of our own diseases. The defects of our Christianity as seen in our social and civic life, as seen in our increasing divorces, in brutal lynchings, in race prejudice, in city graft, and labor troubles, lead many a thoughtful Japanese to hesitate about accepting Christianity. God is awakening us of the West to a higher morality and a nobler brotherhood, and at the same time he is leading the people of the East into his kingdom of universal righteousness, that they and we may be his one great family, all sons and daughters of the living, loving Father.

Japan a Factor in Korea's
Christianization

We cannot close this chapter without reference to the Korean problem. Since Japan has acquired a protectorate over Korea, the political future of the peninsula is closely bound up with that of Japan. It is therefore natural that the development of Christianity there will be on lines similar to those in Japan. As Prince Ito says, "The missionaries and I are working for the same object, namely, the uplifting of the people of Korea." He is placing the best of Japanese officials in charge of reforms in Korea, among them several prominent Christians like Judge Watanabe. For the first time in that land an open code of civil and criminal law has been put in operation, with open courts of justice. Whatever we may think of Japan's doings in Korea, it is plain that Prince Ito's work is making a political and educational environment in which the new and inexperienced Korean Church will have the same peaceful development as in Japan, and will have increased power to regenerate the moral life of those twelve millions.

Thus there are problems within and without the Churches of Japan; problems national and international; problems that concern the Churches of America as well as those over there. In fact, the missionary problems of the nineteenth century have rapidly expanded into the world problems of the twentieth century. Instead of being the white man's burden, it is found that it is God's way to make it the burden of all progressive nations, whether white or yellow or brown. Thus the East and the West, joining hands, shall make the Christ-spirit king over all.

VIII

THE OUTLOOK

The Reaction.

It would not be right to give the impression that missions are an unqualified success in Japan. There have indeed been amazing triumphs in the face of great difficulties, and a degree of success in every department of work, for which all Christians should truly be thankful. Yet an apparently great disaster befell the whole work about 1890, and the hearts of the missionaries were saddened and the churches at home were perplexed. The number of yearly Protestant baptisms suddenly decreased fifty per cent. The churches that had been doubling in membership every three years in the "eighties" not only did not double in the next decade, they increased scarcely fifty per cent. although the missionary force was one-half greater and the workers were better equipped for service. The number of converts scarcely kept pace with the losses which some of the churches suffer annually.

There is nothing to conceal and nothing to

Meaning of "Reaction"

extenuate. We want our set-backs and failures to be as well-known as our successes. The year 1889 witnessed a gain of 5,677 converts, but then came a drop in a single year to an increase of only 1,199. In 1891 the Presbyterian group gloried in their rapidly growing church of 10,961 members, and the Congregationalists likewise exulted over their 10,760. The statistics of 1902 showed that the former had increased to 11,651 only and the latter to 11,548. In the Sendai field, there were 407 Congregational Christians enrolled by the end of 1892, but ten years later there were only 325, although there had been over 200 baptisms. These are rather extreme cases, but they will all the better reveal what that dread word "Reaction" means.

Some Causes

Among the contributory causes of the falling off, the following were most influential:

Craze for Foreign

1. The eager adoption of everything foreign by the Japanese reached its height in the "eighties." Christianity was one of these foreign things that then began to be popular. It was the style not only to eat and drink and to be clothed like foreigners, but it was advocated in the ablest paper in Japan that it would be a good thing for the people to become baptized and join the church. The idea was that if Japan should rapidly become Christian even nominally, treaty revision would be much more easily obtained, and Japan would become the political equal of the nations of the West—a thing most intensely desired by the whole nation. This political inequality, that put Japan in the same class with Turkey and Egypt, was keenly felt. The Japanese wanted to have all foreigners placed under Japanese laws and courts, but Western powers refused thus to trust Japan until secret trial by torture was abolished, open courts of justice established, and equal rights given to the people.

Ambition for Political Equality

Since such reforms would take many years to accomplish, it was little to be wondered at that a reaction against foreigners set in, and that their mood should swiftly change into dislike of everything foreign. Christianity thus became one of the things to be swept out of the country. There followed a social persecution hard for the native Christians to endure, and hence thousands no more went to church.

Change of Attitude

2. Multitudes had become church members without sufficient instruction and without a spiritual renewal. "Let's have a hundred baptized in our church before New Year," said an enthusiastic Japanese Christian in October. And they were lined up by the score at every baptismal service and solemnly received. That church lost more than a hundred when the reaction struck the nation. This is not an absolute loss, for a dozen or a score of them will be recovered to the church on a far better understanding of devotion to Christ, and most of the others remain friendly to the church and will contribute on special occasions for religious purposes.

Superficial

Influx of Higher Criticism 3. The new philosophical, historical, and religious knowledge, that passes under the name of "higher criticism," came like a wave over the young Christian community, on which it had the same effect as in the West. It was a world movement in Christian thought, and that a people eager for knowledge should have been unable to harmonize the new forms of truth with the old should not occasion any great surprise. Nor is it unnatural that many thoughtful men should have felt the church to be too narrow in its sphere of usefulness, and too weak in its organization to do much for Japan. Many of these men have since risen to high positions of social and official influence, and though they do not attend church, they are often very sympathetic toward Christian work and frequently give it generous financial support.

High Moral Standards 4. Of course there were not a few who loved the liberty of certain social customs that no Christian church would permit, and the little churches unhesitatingly removed the names of offenders from their rolls. The 50,000 church members of to-day are morally and spiritually in a much better condition than were the 35,000 of ten years ago.

This trying reaction has not been without its good effects. It sifted the chaff from the wheat. "Will ye also go away?" was the sad question heard on every side. But the large majority knew in their deepest hearts that no one had the words of eternal life save Christ, and with a clearer and deeper faith they made large sacrifices and remained at their posts. The churches of Christ have now passed one severe crisis, and are rooted and grounded in the faith that conquers the world. A new study of the Bible has given pastors, evangelists, and other leading Christians a power of endurance and courage and influence they might not otherwise have gained.

Church
Purified

The Forward Movement.

In spite of the ten years of reaction, the Christians felt a divine impulse to make the beginning of the twentieth century the occasion of an earnest advance movement in which apologetics should give place to a direct and forceful presentation of the simple gospel of salvation through Christ. Leading Japanese Christians called the missionaries to join them in this new movement. The first forward step was taken by the Japanese Evangelical Alliance, which voted to raise 5,000 yen

Japanese
Initiative

for the purpose. The gathering at Tokyo of 450 missionaries into a General Conference, October, 1900, afforded the Japanese the opportunity to invite their cooperation, and the request was most heartily complied with. A joint committee was appointed and the Empire was divided into sixteen districts, with local committees to organize and direct the movement.

Thorough
Plans The work was signally blessed. What was done in the great capital will give some indication of the nature and scope of the work. The city was divided into five districts. Fifty-one churches, sixty-two pastors and evangelists, and twelve missionaries united for six weeks in daily meetings for the unconverted. Three hundred and sixty persons formed twenty-seven bands of workers, who marched through the streets with banners and lanterns, singing to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia," an inspiring hymn of Christian warfare. Half a million handbills were distributed, and 310,000 tracts were given away. Over 5,000 "Seekers of the Way" handed in their names.

Power of Music In Sendai the churches hired a theatre, the best in the place, holding 2,000, and never before in a Japanese theatre was heard a chorus of 100 Christian young men and women (accompanied by piano, organ, and violins), singing gospel hymns. Christian music for the first time began to attract serious attention from outsiders. "You have a great advantage in your music," said a thoughtful teacher. "It cleans out the heart, and then you sow the good seed." A band of singers was formed that accompanied the speakers into another province. It was not exceptional to have a hundred or more names of inquirers handed in at some of the meetings.

As news of these meetings spread to the towns and cities of the interior, the Christians everywhere echoed the Macedonian's cry, "Come over and help us." They gave money as never before, and made strenuous efforts to arouse the communities. Providentially, such men as Dr. Merriman C. Harris, Mr. John R. Mott, and Dr. R. A. Torrey, came just in time to witness this movement and to stimulate it by their inspiring messages. The readiness of the people to hear, and their eager acceptance of the message, was such, that Dr. Torrey said: "This land is ripe for the great harvest." The influence of this revival was felt even in the conservative Imperial University, where for the first time in its history a distinctively Christian worker, Mr. Mott, was invited to speak.

This "Taikyo Dendo," as the movement was called, brought joy and stimulus to the whole Church of Japan. Hundreds of those whose faith had been weakened returned to their allegiance, and hundreds of conversions of conspicuously wicked men and women took place. The movement astonished the general public who thought that Christianity was about dead, and startled, no one knows how many thousands, into a serious consideration of the claims of Christ to be the Saviour of the world. Organized opposition was broken down, the scornful were converted or made ashamed, and hosts of friends were won for Christianity who themselves have not entered the Church, but who are willing that their wives and children should be open Christians.

Greater Things Attempted

This movement brought such fresh enthusiasm and hope to the whole Christian body, missionaries and churches alike, that they were not content with the original plan to limit the special work to the opening year of the century, and so it has been continued in one form or another ever since. The National Exposition at Osaka (1903) had before its gates a Christian preaching-place where the various missions took their turns at daily and nightly preaching, and where the Christian invitation in huge letters was on the roof of the building—"COME AND SEE." This could not have been achieved but for the new courage born of the Forward Movement. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall's unique welcome at Sendai, where the non-Christian ladies and gentlemen of the city entertained him, fitting up the hall of the Government College for these Christian lectures, would have been impossible but for this great movement. Mr. Mott's splendid record of 1,467 inquirers in seven cities was, to a large degree, made possible by this same "Taikyo Dendo."

The Forward Movement organized an interdenominational band of 536 workers. It raised an army of 15,440 inquirers. Though only 5,000 yen were at first called for, 10,743 yen were contributed. Dr. Imbrie well says: "This movement has greatly revived the interest of Christian people of the United States and England in the evangelization of Japan." Of National Scope

World's Student Convention.

Then came the World's Student Convention at Tokyo, April, 1907, which has been alluded to in the preceding chapter. Another Advance Step Denominational Cooperation.

That mission work in Japan has tended toward a union of different societies is seen in the formation of the Presbyterian federation already described. There was in the "eighties" an attempt on the part of the Congre- Spirit of Unity gationalists and Presbyterians to form one united work in Japan, but misunderstandings in the United States, together with the opposition of a few persons in Japan, prevented the success of the effort. But at the Tokyo Conference in 1900, the spirit of oneness came upon the missionaries assembled, and all were led to reecho with deeper earnestness than ever before the Master's prayer: "That they all may be one." A committee of eighteen was formed, called the Standing Committee of Co-operating Missions in Japan, whose duties are to foster all possible cooperation, to give counsel with regard to the distribution of forces, to prevent misunderstandings, and to promote harmony.

Prayer for Unity
Enjoined

The only large mission not represented on the committee is the Episcopalian. That body's desire for union is evidenced by the action of the bishops who "urge the use in public worship, at least on Sundays, of that prayer for unity which is contained in the Prayer-book." Bishop Fyson truly says: "God has set before us in this land an open door for reunion, such as cannot be found elsewhere in all the world. It is our privilege and duty to enter this open door, and to seize upon every opportunity that presents itself for forwarding this movement."

After the Tokyo Conference, the missionaries of Central Japan sent out a call to all the Christians in the country to labour with prayer for Christian union. The prayer so widely used is reproduced here in the hope that all who read it will join in its fervent use:

“ Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who hast purchased an universal Church by the precious blood of Thy Son, we thank Thee that Thou hast called us into the same, and made us members of Christ, children of God, and inheritors of the Kingdom of Heaven. Look now we beseech Thee upon Thy Church, and take from it division and strife and whatsoever hinders Godly union and concord. Fill us with Thy love, and guide us by Thy Holy Spirit that we may attain to that oneness for which Thy Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, prayed on the night of His betrayal, who with Thee and the Holy Spirit liveth and reigneth, one God, world without end. Amen.” Prominent missionaries of Tokyo endorsed this call for prayer, and invited its adoption by all.

It will thus be seen that the various missions in Japan have begun this century with a baptism of the spirit of union far surpassing anything heretofore witnessed. Twenty-two denominations joined in active work in the Forward Movement. This Christian fellowship called for a union hymn book, so that Christians meeting in a church other than their own might sing the same songs of Zion.

“When Will Japan Become a Christian Nation?”

Not in a Day We missionaries who saw the enthusiasm and rapid gains of the “eighties” thought that we were about to witness the fulfillment on a grand scale of the ancient words: “A nation born in a day.” It really seemed to many of us that only one generation of missionaries would be necessary to do the foreigner’s share in the work of evangelization.

Then came the reaction. The number of converts not only ceased to double every three years, but thousands of church members left the churches. A daily newspaper, commenting on the set-back, said: “Nothing is left of Christianity save an insignificant Sunday-school work. There is really no power in Christianity. The churches are mostly empty.” After the reaction, nothing more was heard about finishing missionary work in one generation.

Living Message Needed The opening century came with the Forward Movement, begun in weakness and doubt and fear and prayer. It suddenly became abundantly evident that the people were willing to hear, provided that the speakers had a living message. The Cross and the Resurrection, the Personal Saviour, the Son of God who came to redeem all men,—these truths, through the Holy Spirit, took possession of the preachers, and the churches awoke. The newspapers then had to admit that there was power in Christianity after all. To-day the Christians are hopeful, the missionaries are working with joy, everywhere inspiring triumphs of the Cross are being recorded daily.

One of the Christian weekly magazines, not conducted by missionaries, recently quoted Dr. Arthur H. Smith, of China, as saying that it took eight hundred years to make England a Christian nation, and that it would take about as long to convert China. Then the writer adds: "The dream of fifteen years ago that it would take only ten years for Japan to become Christian is passed away forever. . . . If the faith of the first century fills us all, Japan will be a Christian nation within this century." And the article closes with the very proper statement that nothing but a native church, self-supporting and aggressive, can do the work. Foreigners can aid in laying the foundations of Christian institutions, but the great work of converting the nation can be done only by Japanese. The same paper, The Maishu, in another issue, said: "If we examine the past, we see that evangelization at first was largely an intellectual presentation of the truths, the Existence of God, Man's guilt, Christ the Saviour, and Eternal Life. Great success attended this earnest work. The second stage was emphasizing the ethical side of Christianity, on the platform, in the pulpit, and in the press. And our people were greatly uplifted by this work. Now we are entering the third stage when a great harvest is to be expected from the seed so widely sown. And the need now is for spiritual work, by those who have consecrated body and soul to Christ. What we have already seen is, in spite of defects, a wonderful success in the conversion of thousands, in a great awakening of the zeal of Christians, in churches filled, and, in short, in revolutionizing our evangelizing spirit. It is most fitting to give thanks to the Great God who has used us, unworthy instruments, and has enriched us by his grace. We must now receive more of this wonderful spiritual power and go forward to a larger work.”

The Twofold Conflict.

Rev. D. Ebina, one of the ablest preachers of Japan, said, at the World's Student Convention : “During the last forty years Christian young men and women have been fighting on the one hand with the prejudices of the people, and on the other hand with Buddhism and Confucianism, with European positivism, pantheism, materialism, agnosticism, and American mammon-

ism. Our battle has been a hard one, yet we have been gaining ground year by year; and the hope of victory is evermore brightening before us."

When we consider that the Government of Japan, the laws, the courts, education, and the family are being formed on Christian principles that recognize the worth and dignity of every man, woman, and child; that the worship of sun and moon has virtually ceased; that the grosser forms of idolatry have been abandoned; that the moral teachings of Christ have become a part of the ethical treasures of the people; that the "friends of Christianity" number far more than its open professors; that Christian thought has affected the old religions to a remarkable extent; we need not hesitate to say, that, in spite of the traces of heathenism that remain, no other nation has ever been so rapidly permeated with Christian knowledge as has Japan. There never has been in all the history of missions so great a victory for Christ in so short a time as we see to-day in that beautiful island Empire. There never was a non-Christian nation so open-minded and receptive as Japan. And if Christianity cannot win this great people to Christ, then either Christianity is a failure as a universal religion, or those who are entrusted with this divine message have not yet learned what to do with it.

Notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements of the past, in the face of present-day opportunity, we can well say with the Psalmist of olden time :

GIVE THANKS UNTO THE LORD ! DECLARE HIS DOINGS AMONG THE PEOPLES ! MAKE MENTION THAT HIS NAME IS EXALTED !

SOME SUGGESTIONS AS TO HOW TO STUDY THE TEXT-BOOK

IN the first place, do not attempt to memorize the entire chapter. Such a process is necessary with the multiplication table, where every fact is important and every fact of equal worth. In each chapter of this book, however, some facts are of much greater importance than others ; therefore select these and concentrate upon them. You are sure to forget a considerable part of what you study ; make every effort to have the principal points stick. In the questions above no attempt has been made to treat every paragraph of the chapter. Much has purposely been omitted. Most students will find it best to study only a part of what is covered by the questions. In any event, it is better to understand thoroughly and picture vividly a few things rather than to take up many that you will be able only to name. Do not try to swallow more than you can digest.

In the second place, in selecting the points that you decide to study, be guided by the closeness of their connection with the main subject-matter of the chapter. Some paragraphs are more or less digressions, and are placed where they are, only because no more suitable place could be found elsewhere. Experience has shown that it is much easier to understand and remember things when they have a close relation to other things in our minds, therefore select only such points for study as can be linked in a logical chain. Two facts in a clear relation to each other can be remembered better than either fact apart from this relation.

In the third place, do not attempt merely to memorize anything. If you do not understand a point there is no need of burdening your mind with it. If you do understand it, consider carefully its relations—how it affects other things and how other things affect it—and depend upon its associations rather than upon the dead lift of memory to hold it in your mind.

Make much use of paper and pencil in your study. When you have selected your prin-pal points, write them out so that you can have them all under your eye at once. Word your own ideas as clearly as possible in writing; this will help you to think much more effectively. When you are answering a question that calls for a somewhat detailed reply, set down the points that occur to you and spend some time in adding to them; then note whether two or more may not be combined under one fuller and stronger statement. See that all your points are clearly and forcibly put, and, finally, arrange them in what seems their most logical order. The interest that you will naturally feel in comparing these results with those arrived at by the other members of the class will give you increased appetite for the session. It will pay to make notes of any additional matter that may be brought out in the recitation and to incorporate these in a final arrangement and statement.

Review frequently what has been gone over. Many things are confused in our minds or altogether forgotten which would have become both clearly and permanently fixed by a little more reviewing. Even when a thing seems clear at first sight, we cannot be sure that we really understand it until we have allowed it some time to sink in.

Conversation on what you have been studying will be found a valuable form of review.

"Rehearse what you have read to some willing and sympathetic listener."

General reading on the subject before or during the course will be a great help. Many things in the text-book that would otherwise be misunderstood or unnoticed will thus become clear. Begin at once, and what is still more important, continue after the course is over.

Let your motto be: Thorough, effective, permanent work. Work carefully, with a definite aim always in mind, in such a way that your results may have some future value.

Remember, finally, that the end of this study is not only knowledge, but character; not only self-improvement, but the spread of the Kingdom of God. Seek not so much to know more, as to be different; not so much to acquire, as to accomplish. Ask yourself frequently what meaning the things you study should have for your life, and make them the subject of prayer, resolve and action.

APPENDIX B

SUGGESTIONS FOR PRONUNCIATION OF JAPANESE WORDS¹

THE following general rules will suffice to give approximately the pronunciation of the Japanese words used in this volume.

Each syllable ends with a vowel or with the letter n (sometimes changing to m in the middle of a word). A seeming exception is when the system of transliteration gives a doubled consonant in the middle of a word. In that case each letter is pronounced, the first being joined to the preceding vowel.

Consonants have nearly the same sound as in English. Ch is pronounced as in child. G is always hard: in some parts of Japan it is pronounced like ng.

A as in father.

E like ey in they. In some monosyllables, and sometimes at the end of a word, it is shortened so as to be nearly like e in then. Thus the name of one of the prominent cities is pronounced Ko-bē rather than Ko-bay.

¹ From "Japan and its Regeneration."—Rev. Otis Cary.
By permission of The Student Volunteer movement.

I as in machine.

O as in note.

U like oo in boot. At the end of words of more than one syllable it is often nearly inaudible; and it is frequently elided in the middle of a word.

Japanese words are nearly if not quite without accent.
